Email Updates

The National Academies Press e-mail service makes it easy to find out about new titles as they are published. Sign up for the subject categories that interest you and we'll send you e-mail notices of books in those topic areas as they are released.

You can change the categories you receive updates for by returning to this page and signing in. After signing in, review or change your categories and submit your changes.

To change where your email updates are sent--for example, you want them sent to your home email address instead of your work email address, sign up a second time using the new email address.

To stop receiving email updates, cancel your subscription by entering the email address you subscribed with.

How often will you get email from us?

It varies, but at most 1-2 emails per week. If we don't publish anything in the categories you selected, you will not receive an email update.

Tim O'Reilly answers Authors Guild

September 28, 2005 @ 5:32 am · Filed under Copyright\(?\)

By David Rothman

Tim O'Reilly, one of the most respected publishers of computer books, sides with Google, against which the Authors Guild has launched a copyright suit. Here's part of his op-ed in the New York Times today:

Google promises an alternative to the obscurity imposed on most books. It makes that great corpus of less-than-best sellers accessible to all. By pointing to a huge body of print works online, Google will offer a way to promote books that publishers have thrown away, creating an opportunity for readers to track them down and buy them. Even online sellers like Amazon offer only a small fraction of the university libraries' titles. While there are many unanswered questions about how businesses will help consumers buy the books they've found through a search engine for printed materials that is as powerful as Google's current Web search, there's great likelihood that Google Print's Library Project will create new markets for forgotten content. In one bold stroke,

Procedure to search UPexPlore for electronic books

To access our full text, all users have to register annually at the AIS (Library).

As the "Branch" in the fixed field element is coded as "ein" for Internet another method of grouping the different ebook collections have to be implemented. This is necessary for users to search a specific service unit's ebook collection. The following collections are already searchable in UPEXplore:
