ABSTRACT

This study seeks to investigate form and content of African music as exemplified by Bukusu circumcision music. Technological products, growth of urban centres, emergence of industries and the widespread of deadly diseases such as HIV/AIDS have led to remarkable adjustments in the social behaviour and other ways of life in African communities. These adjustments have strained the socio-cultural patterns of African traditional ceremonies leading to a shift in the form, content, significance and performance of music in such ceremonies.

The dilemma and problem in the Bukusu community is centred on how to strike a balance between the traditional and modern perspectives in the form, content, organization and performance of Bukusu circumcision music. This dilemma has given rise to three protagonists: the traditionalists, semi-traditionalists and modernists. While traditionalists advocate for the traditional organization and performance of Bukusu circumcision music, the semi-traditionalists mix the modern and traditional aspects. On the other hand, the modernists have altogether done away with the traditional music.

This study identifies, investigates and explains the various structures, forms, meanings and functions of traditional Bukusu circumcision music against the backdrop of modernity. Here, by modernity we mean capitalistic and monetary oriented economies together with religious ideologies foreign to the African belief systems. Such ideologies are, for example, embodied in Christianity and Islam. It is recommended that important virtues embodied in the Bukusu circumcision ritual be incorporated and perpetuated within the modern social trends. This would sustain the social controls that such virtues effect and, by extension, stand for in most African communities.

Primary and secondary sources of data were consulted. Collection of primary data involved carrying out both participant and non-participant observations in Bungoma District in Western Province of Kenya, where most Bukususes reside. Interviews and focus group discussions were also employed in primary data collection. Purposive and snowball sampling techniques were used to identify respondents who included circumcisers, initiates, song leaders, singers and instrumentalists among others. Secondary sources included information from written materials like books, journals, reports, articles, seminar papers and periodicals.

Findings of this research are a record of Bukusu circumcision music, which is ever evolving to conform to the changing socio-cultural and economic situation of the society. They are an invaluable assessment tool in the evaluation of the past, present and future perspectives of the music. Above all, the findings are a repository for reference by future generations in scholarship and ethnomusicological research.

Key Words: Form, Content, Bukusu, Luyia, Lubukusu, Chinyimba, Creativity, Circumcision music, Circumcision ceremony, Soloist, Response, Solo-response form.

DEDICATION

To my family: my wife Florence, our children: Faith, Nancy, Molly, Austin and Oscar for their patience. May this work be a living proof to them that: hard work, patience, unselfishness and prayer always pay abundantly.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This work would not have been accomplished without the moral, financial and professional support from various individuals and institutions. First and foremost, I wish to thank the UNESCO through the Department of Culture in the Republic of Kenya for giving me financial support that made it possible for the initial field research to be undertaken. My special thanks goes to Mr. Silvers L. Anami, the Director of Culture, Ministry of Gender, Sports and Social Services.

I am particularly grateful to my supervisor Professor Meki Nzewi for his understanding and professional assistance. I am also indebted to Professor Peter Ndege, Dr. Fr. Joseph Kahiga, Dr. Andrew Chege, Dr. Cletus Chukwu, Fr. Francis Moriasi, Mr. Basil Okong'o and Dr. Christopher Odhiambo all of Moi University for the invaluable professional guidance and moral support. This acknowledgement would not be complete without expressing my gratitude to Mr. Kaskon Mindoti, Dr. Henry Wanjala and Mr. Aggrey Nganyi for their close co-operation that was instrumental towards the shaping of this thesis. I am most indebted to my family for their supportive co-operation that essentially facilitated the realization of my academic potential.

Finally, I am thankful to my research assistants namely; Mr. Kennedy Simiyu, Mr. Sammy Mulongo, Mr. Joseph Musakali, Mr. Patrick Khakabo, Mr. Joseph Kimituni and Mr. Levi Juma for their commitment that brought the whole work into the form in which it appears now. I specifically acknowledge Mr. James Mwaniki's efforts, determination and editorial skills without which this work would not have come to fruition. I am grateful to all informants whom I may not have mentioned by name. I wish them all God's blessings in their endeavours.
