Authors' note

J. BOOMKER, M.M. HENTON, T.W. NAUDÉ and F.W. HUCHZERMEYER

CORRECTION

The bacterial isolate from trout referred to in this article was recently re-examined. It was initially thought to be Aeromonas salmonicida, but using a much larger series of biochemical tests, it was found to be Vibrio (Listonella) anguillarum. V. anguillarum has been associated with furunculosis in marine and fresh-water fish, causing lesions as described in the article.