ANNEXURE J

DEMOGRAPHIC ENDOWMENT OF TRADITIONAL AUTHORITIES IN SUB-SAHARAN AFRICA

The demographic endowment and characteristics of traditional authorities will assist the reader to know the people the researcher is studying. This information seeks to reveal that their availability or lack of such availability either enables them to participate, or prevents them from participating in municipal activities. The typologies that are going to be used in this section are: age, gender, and education level, number of household members, political affiliation, employment status and source of income amongst others.

Age

Age is perceived as having an effect on the participation of members in development issues. Older members of the community are heads of households and are perceived to have slowed down in their participation when they are compared with younger members (Diaz-Cayeron et al. 2009:31). This implies that the more the members of the community become older the more they contribute less in development matters. They have families to look after unlike young ones who still have energy and less family or none responsibilities.

Gender

The institution of traditional leadership had excluded women within its ranks simply because it was based on hereditary power (Mamdani). In the study of ward committees at Msinga Hebsicus Coast and eThekwini municipalities in South Africa (Todes et al. 2007) found that gender was not implemented at the local level. This is confirmed by the study conducted in KZN by (Himlin 2005) which found no gender balance since there were more men than women in the ward committees (Himlin 2005). The above two studies are corroborated by the study conducted by the Commission on Gender Equality (2002: ix-x) on nine local municipalities in South Africa, which found no proof of women involvement in their IDPs. This is despite the provision of the Municipal Structures Act, 1998 that in an alternate manner women should be included in all structures of government. It is important to realise that most of South Africa is influenced by traditional values in one way or another, where leadership is dominated by males (Lutz and Linder 2004:21).

Household size

Tettey et al. (2003:242) found that traditional leaders in Ghana included kings, as well as other aristocrats, who were also heads of extended families, since their offices are rooted in pre-colonial States and other political polities. Traditional authorities were not a subject of the electoral process, but inherited their positions; and their legitimacy is derived from history and culture (Lutz and Linder 2004:13). This could possibly suggest that education as a criterion of inheritance plays no role in their positions.

Educational level of traditional leaders

Education is regarded as the privilege of the right people, in contrast to those who seek self-interest (Hodgkinson 1978:152). Those who are educated are in a better position to engage with issues than the uneducated (Diaz-Cayeros et al. 2009:32). Training plays a crucial role in development, since it enhances efficiency and sustainability.

If traditional leaders are trained they would be better able to understand gender complexities, so that they could then accommodate women as traditional leaders (Economic Commission for Africa 2005:18). The implication of this section is that education has the potential to shape and transform the behaviour and the thinking of people – to enable them to understand that people come people first – before any connotation is attached to them.

Political affiliation

South Africa, Malawi and Uganda demands that traditional leaders should be politically neutral, so that they can promote national unity (Muriaas: 2009:29). The study in the traditional authorities in Mozambique by Kyed and Buur (2007:375), however, revealed that there was a tendency by the ruling parties to manipulate traditional authorities by demanding that they maintain neutrality in politics.
Those who want to participate in party politics on a full-time basis should be replaced by someone else (White Paper on Traditional Leadership and Governance 2003:39).

The Ugandan Constitution of 1995, Article 246, clause 3 (e) in aligning with the South African White Paper on Traditional Leadership and Governance 2003 prohibits traditional leaders from engaging in partisan politics.

As a result, in both countries, traditional authorities are accorded an ex-officio status at local level (Muriaas 2009:31). However, Ray and van Rouveroy van Nieuwaal (1996:28) argue that the reasons why the governments insisted on the neutrality of traditional authorities is that they were both engaged in competition and mutual dependence.

Resources

Traditional Authorities in the Third World need to be provided with resources, in order to perform their duties in their communities and also to feed their families. The study by the Department of Political and Administrative Studies in Namibia (1996) found that traditional authorities remain the only alternative in rural areas, and as such, allocating resources to them could enhance their performance. The same study also found that traditional leaders invest their finances to carry out their duties. The lack of adequate financial resources forces them to seek employment far from their communities, in order to support their households (Dusing 2002:243).

This is corroborated by the findings of Himlin (2005) and those of Riper and Deacon (2008) in the City of Johannesburg, who found that there was a lack of administrative support and other resources to ward committees, such as finances for transport to attend ward committee meetings.

Household income

Traditional leaders have suffered in the hands of some political leaders, such as in Ghana, where Nkrumah cut off their incomes (Van Rouveroy van Nieuwaal 1987:18). This could be interpreted as punishment for not supporting the government of the day.
In Botswana, chiefs are paid salaries by government to perform their responsibilities, such as promoting the welfare of their people, and any other task delegated to them by the government (Lutz and Linder 2004:32). In Nigeria, traditional leaders are paid stipends by the State or local government. However, these are not sufficient; and they are not paid regularly to perform their roles and responsibilities (Blench et al. 2006:69). However, in Uganda, unlike in Botswana and Nigeria, traditional authorities are not paid at all, since they are restricted from participating in any government functions (Constitution of Uganda, 1996, Article 246, clause 3 (d).

The study by Sida (1996:107) found salary and other incentives to be factors that could keep professionals and potential leaders in their own countries to contribute to service delivery. If there is a lack of salaries, as has been the case with many Sub-Saharan countries, the likelihood is the collapse of State institutions (Wohlgemuth 1996, in Sida 1996:175).
