SUMMARY

The African Peer Review Mechanism (APRM) was developed under the New Partnership for Africa’s Development (NEPAD), the development framework of the African Union (AU) which replaced the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in 2002. Through the APRM, the AU has established a system for assessment of governance in participating countries and for the development of programmes of action to address identified shortcomings.

The APRM is a voluntary, ‘soft’ mechanism of supervision which combines self-assessment with regional monitoring. The APRM takes a holistic approach to governance with a mandate covering democracy and political governance, economic governance, corporate governance and socio-economic development.

This study considers the role that the APRM plays in the realisation of human rights. It examines the manner in which human rights are reflected in the APRM framework documents as well as the manner in which rights-based principles such as participation, accountability and transparency are reflected in the process. The strengths and weaknesses of various methods of international monitoring to ensure compliance with human rights are examined. The APRM country review reports and implementation reports of Ghana, Rwanda and Kenya are studied in conjunction with reports from domestic and international human rights monitoring bodies and national development plans. The aim of the study is to ascertain whether the APRM adds value to mechanisms established with the purport of assisting in the realisation of human rights.

This study illustrates that the APRM plays a complementary role in human rights monitoring. It is clear, however, that it is only able to play a meaningful role if the state under review is motivated to undertake reform. Human rights have a role to play with regard to the APRM process itself and in identifying and addressing governance shortcomings. The specific and time-bound commitments in the Programme of Action are unique to the APRM. If these commitments are developed through a rights-based approach and their implementation adequately monitored the APRM could play an important role in inducing compliance with human rights.

1.1 Background and problem statement

In the first year of the new millennium, the leaders of the world set out a number of development goals to be achieved by 2015.¹ These have become known as the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs). The MDGs have been summarised as follows by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP):²

1) Eradicate extreme poverty and hunger
2) Achieve universal primary education
3) Promote gender equality and empower women
4) Reduce child mortality
5) Improve maternal health
6) Combat HIV/AIDS, malaria and other diseases
7) Ensure environmental sustainability
8) Develop a global partnership for development

In the Millennium Declaration the world leaders also agreed on ‘certain fundamental values’ to be applied within and among states: freedom, equality, solidarity, tolerance, respect for nature and shared responsibility.³ In the Declaration these values are couched in the language of rights and duties. There is thus a clear global commitment for human rights which accompanies the commitment to achieve the developmental goals set out above, which could equally well have been couched in the language of human rights.\textsuperscript{4}

Statistics indicate that African countries have made some progress in meeting the MDGs. However, most countries will fail to achieve the goals by 2015.\textsuperscript{5} Currently almost 30\% of African children under five suffer from malnutrition.\textsuperscript{6} Just over 60\% of children finish primary school. The child mortality rate is 163 per 1000. The HIV prevalence rate is 5.8\%. Maternal mortality rate is 919 per 100,000 live births. Only 44\% of births are attended by skilled health staff. These are averages and there is obviously much difference between countries and within countries. Rural areas often have the worst conditions. Though the figures represent some improvement compared to the situation a decade earlier, Africa still scores worst of all regions, except on births attended by skilled health staff. Progress in implementing MDG 8, a global partnership for development, has also been limited.\textsuperscript{7}

Statistics such as those above help to illustrate the scope of the problem. It must, however, be noted that statistics from Africa often are unreliable or even non-existent.\textsuperscript{8} For example the World Development Report 2008 provides statistics on the population below the national and international poverty lines. Of 37 African countries surveyed there was no information at all for four countries,\textsuperscript{9} no information on population below national poverty lines for another five

\textsuperscript{6} The statistics which follows are averages from sub-Saharan African states and thus do not include Algeria, Egypt, Libya, Morocco and Tunisia. Statistics from World Bank World development report 2008 (2007) 339.
\textsuperscript{8} C Clapham Africa and the international system – The politics of state survival (1996) 163.
\textsuperscript{9} Angola, Republic of Congo (Congo-Brazzaville), Democratic Republic of the Congo (Congo-Kinshasa) and Sudan.
countries and no information on population below international poverty lines for another five countries.

An often used measurement of development is Gross National Income (GNI) per capita. This is despite the fact that it is widely recognised that GNI does not give the full picture. The UNDP has thus developed the Human Development Index (HDI), a composite index composed of GNI per capita, life expectancy at birth and level of education. States are divided into high, medium and low human development. All 26 states in the world with low human development are in sub-Saharan Africa. Of the 75 states with high human development, only three are in Africa. The fact that a country like Libya is included on the list of countries with high human development illustrates that respect for civil and political rights is not considered in the HDI.

Composite indexes like the HDI can be misleading, for example by not providing any disaggregated data, but illustrate one of the central problems that the African continent is facing: the denial of socio-economic rights. There are many explanations for this situation, both external and internal. Many African leaders focus their rhetoric on external causes of poverty and lack of development. However, there is increased recognition in Africa of the importance of improved domestic governance. It is assumed in this study that accountable governments free of repression and corruption are more responsive to the needs of their people.

Government corruption limits the resources available for poverty reduction. Only three African countries surveyed in Transparency International’s corruption perception index 2008 scored over 5 on a scale where 10 is clean and 0 is highly corrupt.\footnote{Botswana, Mauritius and Cape Verde. Transparency International ‘Corruption perceptions index 2008’ (2008). \url{www.transparency.org/policy_research/surveys_indices/cpi/2008} (accessed 21 October 2008).}

The measurement of good governance is no exact science. The methodology of surveys and indexes such as those above can be challenged. However, together with country specific analyses they provide some insight into the extent of the African drama.

Bad governance is generally seen as one of the factors which have contributed to the perilous world most Africans are facing. It is a world of poverty and for many a world of early death. In many countries it is also a world of repression. During the cold war African leaders could get away with ignoring the welfare of their subjects. Today the situation is different and good governance has become the paradigm subscribed to by both donors and by African leaders. Within the broader good governance framework, human rights have over the last decades developed into an ethical \textit{lingua franca}.\footnote{J Tasioulas ‘The moral reality of human rights’ in Thomas Pogge (ed) \textit{Freedom from poverty as a human rights} (2007) 75.} Though rhetoric and action do not always go hand in hand, institutional frameworks, at both the domestic and international level, have been established to ensure accountability and respect for human rights.

Though rhetoric and action do not always go hand in hand, institutional frameworks, at both the domestic and international level, have been established to ensure accountability and respect for human rights.
The extent to which the various institutional frameworks contribute to the realisation of human rights varies. Each initiative must be evaluated on its own merits. It is equally important to consider how different mechanisms, local, national, sub-regional, regional, global, non-governmental, governmental and inter-governmental, can work together. It should also be noted that many initiatives that do not focus exclusively on human rights may have an important role to play.

Through the African Peer Review Mechanism (APRM), the African Union has established a system for assessment of governance in participating countries and for the development of programmes of action to address identified shortcomings. The APRM was developed under the auspices of the New Partnership for Africa’s Development (NEPAD), the development arm of the African Union (AU) which replaced the Organization of African Unity (OAU) in 2002.

The APRM is a voluntary, ‘soft’ mechanism of supervision which combines self-assessment with regional monitoring. The APRM takes a holistic approach to governance monitoring. Its mandate covers four fields: democracy and political governance, economic governance, corporate governance and socio-economic development.\(^\text{17}\) It has been argued that the importance of the APRM lies in the fact that it ‘holds the potential truly to set NEPAD apart from its predecessors.’\(^\text{18}\) This is because previous development plans are said to have suffered from a lack of monitoring.

1.2 Objective of the study and research questions

The objective of the study is to assess, in the broader context of human rights monitoring, the role of the APRM in contributing to the realisation of human rights in Africa.

The main research question of the study is: What role can the APRM play in inducing compliance with international human rights norms in Africa?

A number of other questions will be addressed in an effort to develop an answer to the main research question:

- Why was the APRM established?
- What role do human rights play in the mandate of the APRM?
- To what extent is a human rights-based approach followed in the implementation of the APRM?
- How does the APRM compare to other methods of international monitoring used to induce compliance with international human rights norms?
- To what extent has human rights been considered in the reviews of the first countries to go through the process namely Ghana, Rwanda and Kenya?

1.3 Terminology

Human rights

This thesis adopts the meaning of human rights as expressed in the main regional human rights treaty, the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights (African Charter) further developed in other African treaties and through the practice of the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights (African Commission). The African Charter constitutes a good basis for measuring human rights in Africa since it has been ratified by all the members of the African Union. The Charter provides that international human rights law shall be used to interpret its provisions.

Compliance

A lexical definition of compliance is ‘acting according to certain accepted standards.’ In the context of human rights these accepted standards are set out in domestic constitutions (and legislation) and in international treaties and declarations. The way role players have to act in order not to violate these rights depends on the type of norm and the position actors themselves hold in the system. The focus of this thesis is on measures to ensure that the main role player, the state, acts in a way that respects, fulfils and protects human rights.

1.4 Literature review

The APRM has generated much interest. Numerous papers on the APRM framework have been published. Many articles, in particular in the first years after the adoption of the APRM, tend to be very similar in content. They mainly repeat what is said in the primary documents relating to the process. Much was written just after the mechanism was adopted and when there was still considerable confusion as to how the APRM would evolve, for example in relation to whether it should cover political governance or not.\textsuperscript{24} Some of the members of the Panel of Eminent Persons, which oversees the implementation of the APRM process, have shared their views.\textsuperscript{25} Some articles acknowledged the limitations of an early evaluation of the process.\textsuperscript{26} Many shorter articles limited to factual updates on the process have been published.\textsuperscript{27} There are also studies on how the APRM compares to other peer review processes.\textsuperscript{28}

The first monograph on the APRM, \textit{The African Peer Review Mechanism – Lessons from the pioneers} brings together the insights that the South African Institute of International Affairs (SAIIA) has accumulated through active engagement with the APRM process since its inception.\textsuperscript{29} The focus of this book is on procedural aspects, in particular how to strengthen public participation in the APRM process. SAIIA has also published a number of other papers focusing on in particular procedural aspects and best practices in organising the reviews.\textsuperscript{30}

\item South African Institute of International Affairs ‘APRM lessons learned’, Report of the SAIIA conference for civil society, practitioners and researchers held at the Avianto Conference Centre, Muldersdrift, Johannesburg, 12-13 September 2006; South African Much emphasis has been placed on civil society participation in the APRM process. General evaluations of the reviews that have been conducted have been limited in scope, focusing on specific governance areas as set out in the APRM framework, in particular political governance, or focused on procedural aspects of the reviews. Country-specific evaluations of the reviews in Ghana, Rwanda, Kenya, Nigeria, Benin, Mauritius, South Africa, Institute of International Affairs Planning an effective peer review – A guidebook for national focal points (2007).

and Uganda\textsuperscript{41} have also mainly focused on procedural aspects. The substantive outcomes of specific reviews have received less attention.\textsuperscript{42} Human rights have been considered in some evaluations but generally not by placing the APRM in the context of the existing human rights monitoring framework applicable to the African continent.\textsuperscript{43}

The main pillars of the African human rights system, the African Commission and the African Court on Human and Peoples' Rights, have received much scholarly attention.\textsuperscript{44} However, the system is made up of much more than these institutions.\textsuperscript{45} Indeed as Lloyd and Murray stated in 2004: ‘The arrangements [of the African Union] for dealing with human rights are clearly in a state of considerable confusion and flux’.\textsuperscript{46} In addition to African institutions the human rights system applicable to Africa include how the global human rights system, under the auspices of the United Nations (UN), has interacted with Africa.\textsuperscript{47} Arrangements which are not explicitly focused on human rights, but have the promotion and protection of human rights included in the objectives of the organ should be considered in any examination of regional human rights promotion and protection. The Pan-African Parliament, the Peace and Security Council and the APRM are examples of such institutional arrangements. The contribution of such institutions to human rights has not been sufficiently explored. This thesis tries to fill this gap with regard to the APRM.

1.5 Methodology

This thesis can be said to deal with the impact of law on politics. While the study aims at using an analytical approach wherever possible, descriptive sections are necessary to provide essential information to inform the analysis. In addition to descriptive and analytical approaches, the study takes a comparative approach in analysing how the experiences of different types of monitoring mechanisms can help to understand the functioning of a newly established mechanism.

The research makes use of both primary and secondary material. The APRM framework documents, which include the Memorandum of Understanding; the Declaration on Democracy, Political, Economic and Corporate Governance; the APRM Base Document; Objectives, Standards, Criteria and Indicators for the APRM (OSCI) and the Questionnaire, are analysed with focus on their relevance for human rights.

The APRM process is examined through analysing country review reports and a survey of the extensive literature on the topic. Interviews have been used to fill some gaps in the literature. However, it should be noted that it has not been possible to secure interviews with all relevant stakeholders.

\textsuperscript{47} See eg Viljoen (2007).
International human rights monitoring methods and their impact are examined mainly through analysis of the literature. The case studies make use of primary sources such as findings of national and international human rights bodies, poverty reduction strategy papers, country review reports and implementation reports.

1.6 Structure of the study

This chapter gives a background to the study. It further identifies the issues that will be addressed and identifies where the thesis fits into previous work done in the field.

Chapters two to eight are divided into two parts. Part 1 of the thesis consists of four chapters which set out the mandate and procedures of the APRM and how it relates to other forms of compliance monitoring, in particular with regard to human rights.

Chapters 2 and 3 address the question what the APRM is meant to achieve. Chapter 2 situates the discussion in the context of the many failed plans that have been devised to ensure development in Africa. Chapter 3 gives a historical background to the development of the APRM and further discusses how the APRM framework documents deal with human rights.

Chapter 4 sets out the APRM structures and investigates how these have gone about implementing the mandate. The focus is on popular participation, transparency and accountability in the process, as necessary components of a rights-based approach.

Chapter 5 discusses the APRM in the context of the question why states commit to international human rights treaties. It further discusses theories of compliance with international law and analyses international human rights monitoring mechanisms and considers whether the inclusion of respect for human rights in the APRM mandate constitutes unnecessary proliferation.

Part 2 of the thesis provides analysis in the form of case studies of how human rights feature in the first APRM reviews. Chapters 6, 7 and 8, which deal with Ghana, Rwanda and Kenya, investigate whether the APRM reports and Programmes of Action (POAs) address the relevant issues to improve the enjoyment of human rights, what action has been taken to implement the POAs, and measures taken to improve the human rights situation which are not reflected in the country review reports or POAs. The chapters also discuss issues around financing of the implementation of the POA and its integration with other development frameworks.

Chapter 9 sets out the conclusions and recommendations of the study.

1.7 Limitations

The thesis represents a snap shot of how the process works at this early stage of its development. The APRM has been established recently and only a few country review reports have been published so far. The material available is adequate to illustrate how the APRM process functions. This will be contrasted against the experience with various types of human rights monitoring which has existed for much longer.\(^{48}\)

Ghana, Rwanda and Kenya have been chosen for the case studies on the basis that they were the first countries reviewed and there is thus more information available on the impact of the reviews of these countries than those who have been reviewed at a later stage. It has unfortunately not been possible to conduct field research in Ghana, Rwanda and Kenya. Field research might have added some insights. However, the nature of the study is such that it has been deemed sufficient to conduct it mainly through desk research.

THE ROLE OF THE AFRICAN PEER REVIEW MECHANISM IN HUMAN RIGHT MONITORING
CHAPTER 2
THE QUEST FOR DEVELOPMENT

2.1 Introduction

This chapter sets out to answer the question why the African Peer Review Mechanism was established. The chapter first explores the origins of the APRM against the background of other attempts to improve the living conditions of Africans since independence. Development plans and their shortcomings are discussed. This is followed by a discussion of the latest continental development plan, the New Partnership for Africa’s Development (NEPAD), considering the views of both its proponents and detractors.

2.2 The failure of development

2.2.1 Conceptualising development

Development has always been an elusive concept. In 1971 Lofchie noted that ‘the notion of development has become so diffuse that it must be redefined afresh by each scholar who wishes to use it’. Gross National Income (GNI) per capita remains a popular determinant of the development of a country. However, for a long time it has been recognised that this criterion is inadequate. Economic growth is necessary but not sufficient to achieve substantive poverty reduction. As noted in chapter 1, the UNDP Human Development Index (HDI) is also too narrow in its conception of development. Among its shortcomings is that it does not reflect that exclusion and lack of accountability are not included in national statistics.

1 MF Lofchie State of the nations: Constraints on development in independent Africa (1971) 3.
In his book Development as freedom Amartya Sen treats ‘the freedom of individuals as the basic building blocks of development.’\(^3\) Achieving development requires the removal of major sources of unfreedom: poverty as well as tyranny, poor economic opportunities as well as systematic social deprivation, neglect of public facilities as well as intolerance or overactivity of repressive states.\(^4\)

Development as freedom, the concept of development I adopt in this study, requires respect for human rights. It further requires a just economic world order to allow for the economic opportunities that would decrease the incidence of poverty.\(^5\)

Development no longer means economic growth from which all else will flow: it incorporates broad social objectives; notions of people’s right to certain opportunities, services and levels of care; and issues of sustainability and security. Development has come to mean the creation of an entirely different society, where absolute poverty is eradicated, where all people have access to the same opportunities, where all live without fear.

This can be contrasted with economic freedom as defined by the so called Chicago school, with the IMF as one of its main proponents, which over the last decades, often successfully, has argued for wholesale economic liberalisation, with disastrous results.\(^6\)

2.2.2 A historical overview of African development plans

The African state

The focus of most of Africa’s post-independence leaders was on staying in power and divisions in society were fostered and exploited by the leaders.\(^7\) Calls for ‘development’, ‘liberation’ and ‘unity’ were made. However, with few exceptions such calls were only made as a rhetorical diversion from the real focus, regime survival.\(^8\) The statist economic structures with their dependence on the former colonial power were retained and used by rulers to increase their wealth.\(^9\) Available resources were used for elite consumption, not investment.\(^10\) Clientilism played an important role in this neo-patrimonial system, which is a defining feature of many African countries still today.\(^11\)

Not much attention was given to how ‘the political structures and practices, the administrative system, or even the social institutions of a country might affect its possibility of development.’\(^12\) If considered at all traditional culture was seen as hindering development rather than something that could be used positively.\(^13\)

\(^{9}\) Ake (1996) 6.

\(^{11}\) Chabal (2002), Taylor (2005) 2-4. ‘In a neo-patrimonial system, political accountability rests on the extent to which patrons are able both to influence and to meet the expectations of their followers (or ‘constituents’) according to well-established norms of reciprocity’. Chabal (2002) 451. However, compare E Kannyo (‘Liberalization, democratization and political leadership in Africa’ in Jeggan C Senghor and Nana K Poku Towards Africa's renewal (2007) 63-84) 78-79 who argues that patrimonial networks are slowly being replaced by class formation through societal changes brought about by urbanisation and capitalism. Kannyo argues that developed countries could contribute to the demise of neo-patrimonialism through the return of stolen assets and the opening of markets. An improvement in socio-economic conditions would mean less need to search for ‘heroic leaders’ which would ‘eventually mean that institutions [would] matter more than men ...’. Kannyo (2007) 79.

\(^{13}\) Ake (1996) 15.
This neglect of local culture had, and continues to have, serious implications for the whole development enterprise.\(^{14}\)

Because the development paradigm tends to have a negative view of the people and their culture, it cannot accept them on their own terms. Its point of departure is not what is but what ought to be. The paradigm focuses on the possibility of Africa’s becoming what it is not and probably can never be.

Self-reliance v structural adjustment

In the wake of decolonisation, developing countries found themselves in the majority in global organisations such as the United Nations. This numerical advantage was used to promote the idea of the establishment of a new economic order that would result in more equal relations with the developed world. In 1974 the UN adopted the Declaration and Program of Action of the New International Order and the Charter of Economic Rights and Duties of States. However, the increased number of developing states did not correspond to a change in the international power balance and the international economic order did not change.

In the late 1970’s the OAU and the UN Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) set out to develop a continental development strategy. In 1980 the OAU Assembly adopted the resulting Lagos Plan of Action.\(^{15}\) The Plan only recognised external factors as an explanation for the lack of development.\(^{16}\) The proposed solution lay in self-reliance and regional cooperation. According to the Lagos Plan OAU member states should in their development plans give emphasis to the development of agriculture and agro-based industries, development of socio-economic infrastructure, co-operation, eradication of mass poverty, unemployment, underemployment and the satisfaction of basic needs.’

In the Final Act of Lagos, an annex to the Lagos Plan of Action, the Assembly set out to establish by the year 2000 an African Economic Community with regional economic communities in the five sub-regions of Africa as building blocks.

The Lagos Plan of Action was never implemented. One of the reasons for this was that many African countries in the early 1980’s became reliant on the international financial institutions (the IMF and the World Bank) to avoid economic collapse. The World Bank and the IMF introduced what has become known as Structural Adjustment Programmes (SAPs) which differed from the Lagos Plan of Action in their approach to how development should be achieved. The SAPs were designed to address the four maladies assumed to underlie all economic ills: poor governance, excessive government intervention in the markets, excessive government spending, and too much state ownership. Belt tightening, privatization, liberalization, and good governance became the order of the day.

In 1985 the OAU Assembly adopted Africa’s Priority Position on Economic Recovery (APPER), which reaffirmed the principles of the Lagos Plan of Action but also constituted acceptance of many of the ideas underlying structural adjustment. APPER got support from the UN which adopted it as ‘United Nations Programme of Action for African Economic Recovery and Development, 1986-1990’ (UN-PAAERD).

It should however be noted that African states often tried to avoid implementing the structural adjustment prescriptions, see Taylor (2005) 24.
It is against this background that in 1986, the main regional human rights instrument, the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, adopted by the OAU Assembly in 1981, entered into force. The following year the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights started its work of monitoring compliance with the Charter.

Political conditionality: Good governance

It is now generally recognised that efforts to reduce poverty and improve socio-economic indicators should go hand in hand with improved political governance. More controversial is good governance conditionality which has been introduced by donor countries and international organisations as a requirement for further aid and other benefits such as market access. It is noteworthy how the renewed emphasis on good governance and human rights after the end of the cold war resembles the language of civilisation of the colonial era.

In 1989 UNECA published the African Alternative to SAP (AAF-SAP) which was adopted by the OAU and endorsed by the UN General Assembly. It sought to revive the Lagos Plan of Action but was in practice neglected as the World Bank came up with an alternative development framework, Sub-Saharan Africa: From crisis to sustainable growth: a long-term perspective study. This report introduced the concept of good governance which since then has dominated the development debate. The state which had previously been largely as a problem was now seen as part of the solution.

21 Conditionality is further discussed in chapter 5.
In February 1990 UNECA organised an International Conference on Popular Participation in the Recovery and Development Process in Africa with participants from African civil society organisations, governments and UN agencies. The conference adopted the African Charter for Popular Participation in Development and Transformation. This was the first time that African leaders recognised the importance of participation of all parts of society in formulating and implementing development plans.

In July 1990 the OAU Assembly adopted the Declaration on the Political and Socio-Economic Situation in African and the Fundamental Changes Taking Place in the World. In the Declaration African heads of state and government set out the external causes of the predicament facing their countries, in particular the ‘heavy political and social costs of the structural adjustment programmes’. They also expressed concern about ‘conditionalities of a political nature’. However, for the first time African leaders recognised that the problems facing the continent were not only caused by an international economic order that was detrimental to Africa’s development. Adapting to the agenda set by international donors and the African Charter for Popular Participation, the Declaration made concessions for popular participation in development and held that ‘[a] political environment which guarantees human rights and the observance of the rule of law, would assure high standards of probity and accountability particularly on the part of those who hold public office.’ The necessity of peace and stability for development was also recognised.

Democratisation, whether genuine or rhetorical, became a hallmark of the 1990’s. Multiparty elections have in some cases resulted in ‘greater openness and a greater diversity of political opinion’, while in other states it has caused increased conflict through ‘a more acute rivalry among the elites for control of the state’.31

The Fundamental Change Declaration also reaffirmed self-reliance and regional integration.32 This led to the adoption in 1991 of the Abuja Treaty on an African Economic Community.33 The Treaty includes as one of its principles ‘[r]ecognition, promotion and protection of human and peoples’ rights in accordance with the provisions of the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights’ and ‘[a]ccountability, economic justice and popular participation in development’.34 The Treaty provides that sanctions could be imposed against any member state which ‘persistently fails to honour [their] general undertakings’ or fails to implement decisions of the Community.35

The UN General Assembly adopted the United Nations New Agenda for Development in Africa (UN-NADAF) in December 1991 as a ‘compact of mutual commitments by African countries and the international community’.36 The commitment of African countries included structural reformation of their economies, regional integration, democratisation and implementation of the 32 Fundamental Change Declaration para 8.

33 The establishment of the African Economic Community (AEC) should be through a gradual process no longer than 34 years from the entry into force of the treaty in 1994. Eight regional economic communities have been recognised by the AU to form the building blocks of the AEC. Progress towards free trade within these blocks has been uneven and the realisation of the vision of a self-reliant Africa seems distant.

African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights.\textsuperscript{37} The international community should \textit{inter alia} address the debt issue and increase resource flows and market access.\textsuperscript{38} The evaluation of UN-NADAF noted a number of lessons that should guide future initiatives. These included that attention should be given to conflict resolution and that commitments must be kept. In particular donors should deliver on promised financial support for countries with a good track record. The evaluation noted as a ‘major lesson’ that reliance on liberalization, privatization and market-based reforms has distinct limits, and has in many cases proved counterproductive in accelerating development and alleviating poverty … the wholesale and uncritical adoption of that philosophy, including the minimization of the role of the State and the withdrawal of all forms of State support to local industry and agriculture by African Governments and donors, while the developed countries continued such support by large transfers, currently averaging about 1 billion dollars a day, serve to undermine the region’s development in several ways.\textsuperscript{39}

The 1993 Cairo Declaration on the Occasion of the Thirtieth Anniversary of the Organization of African Unity recognised the ‘close link between development, democracy, security and stability … as the most ideal formula for fulfilling the legitimate aspirations of the peoples of Africa to a decent life, progress and social justice.’\textsuperscript{40} At the same summit the Assembly adopted a Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution.\textsuperscript{41}

In 1994 the OAU Assembly declared that ‘the time has come to take our destiny into our own hands and to seek African solutions to the problems besetting our continent’. Since then much rhetorical emphasis has been placed on finding ‘African solutions’ as opposed to solutions imposed by outsiders in particular the international financial institutions.

In 1995 the OAU Assembly adopted Relaunching Africa’s Economic and Social Development: The Cairo Agenda for Action. The Cairo Agenda reaffirmed the principle of collective self-reliance for self-sustaining development. The Cairo Agenda noted that ‘Africa must take new steps to ensure that it becomes an active partner in the world economic system. In this regard, Africa must adopt a new vision for its development and translate this vision into appropriate programmes.

The Cairo Agenda offered more recognition than previously that African countries could do more to improve the situation for their people by improving their own governance. This was hardly an ‘African solution’ as international donors had tried to impress this view on African leaders for a long time. Following the approach of APPER and UN-NADAF, the Cairo Agenda was divided into two main sections: ‘What we can do for ourselves’ and ‘What we require from our development partners’. The section on ‘What we can do for ourselves’ is divided into the following sub-sections:

- Democracy, governance, peace, security, stability and sustainable development
- Food security
- Capacity building and human resources development

• Structural transformation of African economies

The Agenda provided that:\textsuperscript{48}

Member States should give priority in their development programmes to the basic needs of the people by developing appropriate infrastructure (such as rural roads, potable water supply …), meeting basic food requirements, providing primary health services, education and skills and generating productive and remunerative employment opportunities as a means of eradicating poverty.

This paragraph of the Cairo Agenda illustrates what Sen calls the ‘crucial valuational difference’ between the human capital approach and the human capability approach to development. The human capital approach focuses on economic growth while the focus of the human capability approach is ‘the freedom to live the kind of lives that people have reason to value’, thus focusing on the ends rather than the means.\textsuperscript{49} The human capability approach is clearly linked to human rights, though the section of the Cairo Agenda quoted above refers to ‘basic needs’ rather than human rights. At the same time other parts of the Cairo Agenda focus on ‘human resources’, corresponding to the human capital approach.

The section in the Cairo Agenda on ‘What we require from our development partners’ is divided into the following sub-sections:

• Understanding, appreciation and support of Africa’s development efforts
• Trade and development
• Africa’s external debt

In the view of African leaders there was ‘an urgent need for our development partners to significantly increase resource in-flows to African countries’.\textsuperscript{50} relief was said to be necessary but should not be at the ‘expense of official grant financing’.

In its 1996 Yaoundé Declaration, the OAU Assembly recognised that the plight of Africa was due ‘particularly to the failure of our countries to provide good governance’. Over the following decade debt relief conditional on improved governance and pro-poor policies became the main theme in development discourse.

In 1999 the IMF and the World Bank decided that poor countries that wanted debt relief should prepare Poverty Reduction Strategy Papers (PRSP) to ensure that the poor would benefit from debt relief. 53 55 countries, 30 of which are from Africa, have participated in the PRSP process. When a final PRSP has been approved by the IMF and the World Bank, these countries can reach the so called ‘completion point’ after one year of implementing the PRSP and are then entitled to debt relief. 54

To summarise the situation at the end of the 1990’s: African leaders had since the mid 1980’s adjusted their rhetoric, and to a lesser degree practice, to what was popular among donors and lenders. Rhetoric on the promotion and protection of human rights entered development plans in the late 1980’s as part of the focus on good governance and was included in all plans over the coming decade.

National human rights institutions began to be established in the 1990’s initially mostly with negligible impact.\textsuperscript{55} The same can be said about the regional human rights initiative, the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights. By the end of the 1990’s the mandate of the Commission was set to be complemented by a court, ostensibly to give more ‘teeth’ to the regional human rights system, but at the time few states showed any interest in ratifying the protocol establishing the court.\textsuperscript{56}

Development plans had succeeded each both at the national and the international level. Lack of implementation of commitments by both African countries and donor countries had been identified as the main reason for lack of progress. It was time for change.

2.3 The African renaissance and NEPAD

2.3.1 Building a new Africa

‘African solutions’ did not stop with the Cairo Agenda, which was soon forgotten. However, many of its themes emerged later in new packaging. At a conference in Johannesburg in September 1998, Thabo Mbeki set out his vision for an African renaissance\textsuperscript{57} and what would be needed to achieve it:\textsuperscript{58}

\begin{itemize}
\item \textsuperscript{55} Human Rights Watch Protectors or pretenders – government human rights commissions in Africa (2001).
\item \textsuperscript{56} The institutional framework for implementation of human rights in Africa will be discussed further in chapter 5.
\item \textsuperscript{57} The word ‘renaissance’ is usually associated with Europe and as Magubane has noted ‘the European renaissance was not simply the freedom of spirit and body for the European men, but a new freedom to destroy freedom for the rest of humanity.’ BM Magubane ‘The African renaissance in historical perspective’ in MW Makgoba (ed) The African renaissance – The new struggle Magubane (1999) 21. It should also be noted that the European renaissance was an ‘amorphous process’ and not a ‘willed project’, Taylor (2005) 33.
\item \textsuperscript{58} T Mbeki Africa: The time has come – selected speeches Mbeki (1998) xviii.
\end{itemize}
The new African world which the African renaissance seeks to build is one of democracy, peace and stability, sustainable development and a better life for the people, nonracism and nonsexism, equality among the nations, and a just and democratic system of international governance. None of this will come about of its own. Inasmuch as we liberated ourselves from colonialism through struggle, so will it be that the African renaissance will be victorious only as a result of a protracted struggle that we ourself must wage. ... It is not the repetition of these objectives that will bring about an African renaissance. It is what we do to bring about these objectives that will take us a step forward in our quest for a new and better African reality.

In July 2000 the OAU Assembly adopted a Declaration on Unconstitutional Changes of Government. A Sub-committee to the Central Organ was established to monitor compliance with the Declaration. At the same summit the OAU Assembly adopted the Solemn Declaration of the Conference on Security, Stability, Development and Cooperation in Africa (CSSDCA) which called for the implementation of the AEC Treaty and the Cairo Agenda.\(^{59}\)

The most important decision at the July 2000 summit was the adoption of the Constitutive Act of the African Union (AU) which built on many ideas first set out in the AEC Treaty. One of the objectives of the new continental organisation is the promotion ‘of sustainable development at the economic, social and cultural levels as well as the integration of African economies.’\(^{60}\) Another objective of the AU is to ‘promote and protect human and peoples’ rights in accordance with the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights and other relevant human rights instruments’.

\(^{59}\) Many of the deadlines set for complying with commitments concerning a wide area of issues including human rights and development have already been passed. The CSSDCA can trace its origin to an initiative by the African Leadership Forum which resulted in the adoption in May 1991 of the Kampala Document: Towards a Conference on Security, Stability, Development and Cooperation in Africa. www.africaaction.org/african-initiatives/kampall.htm (accessed 11 July 2007). On the CSSDCA process see further below.

The establishment of the AU has resulted in a number of new institutions. A Pan-African Parliament has been established. Civil society has been given their own AU organ, the Economic, Social and Cultural Council (ECOSOCC). A Peace and Security Council has replaced the OAU Central Organ. These new institutions all have a mandate to promote human rights.\textsuperscript{61}

The Abuja Treaty on the African Economic Community remains in force, but the provisions of the AU Constitutive Act take precedence. It is thus foreseen that the African continent, with the regional economic communities as building blocks, will eventually be transformed into a common market. It is assumed that this economic integration will lead to increased economic growth. Even if this scenario materialises more is needed to achieve sustainable human development and the realisation of human rights.

2.3.2 The New Partnership for Africa’s Development

In an interview with \textit{Time} magazine in September 2000, Thabo Mbeki set out the necessity of creating a new development programme developed by Africans themselves.\textsuperscript{62}

What we are saying to world leaders is that we have to respond to the challenge of African development. … the bulk of the current [African] leadership will at least say, ‘We have to abandon previous experiences of military governments, military coups, and we really have to work hard at this democratic system.’ They are saying, ‘We have to abandon the failed economic policies of the past.’ And I’ve been saying to the leadership of the developed world that they need to respond positively, even if it is to challenge us, to say ‘this is what you say but we want to see practical action from you consistent with what you are saying’. …

\textsuperscript{61} The institutional framework for implementation of human rights in Africa will be discussed further in chapter 5.

Mbeki noted that he had received positive response from donor countries and the international financial institutions to his idea to develop ‘a realistic, practical programme to help Africa’s underdeveloped countries’. Mbeki set out to develop the plan with the assistance of Nigerian President Obasanjo and Algerian President Bouteflika. In October 2000 a team was established at the South Africa-based Development Bank of Southern Africa (DBSA) which prepared a first draft of the new development plan. The draft was subjected to extensive negotiation over the coming months. According to Stephen Gelb, leader of the DBSA team, the Nigerian agenda was to obtain debt relief while Algeria saw the process as a possibility of gaining legitimacy for the regime. South Africa’s motive seemed to be Mbeki’s ambition for African renaissance with South Africa as the leading light. Egypt and Senegal later invited themselves to the drafting club.

Mbeki first publicly announced the plan, then known as the Millennium Africa Renaissance Programme (MAP), at the World Economic Forum in Davos in January 2001. He set out the following priority areas:

63 The three presidents had been mandated by the OAU Assembly in September 1999 to ‘engage African creditors on our behalf on the issue of Africa’s external indebtedness’. See Sirte Declaration, EAHG/Decl (IV) Rev 1. See also Taylor (2005) 34-42.

64 Interview with Stephen Gelb, Pretoria, 4 June 2009. Mr Gelb, an economist, was research coordinator of the SA government team developing the plan from November 2000 to July 2001.

65 Six negotiation meetings were held in South Africa, Algeria, Nigeria and Egypt. Interview with Stephen Gelb, 4 June 2009.

67 As above.

• Creating peace, security and stability, and democratic governance without which it would be impossible to engage in meaningful economic activity;
• Investing in Africa's people through a comprehensive human resource strategy;
• Harnessing and developing Africa's strategic and comparative advantages in the resource based sectors to lead the development of an industrial strategy;
• Increasing investments in the Information and communication technology sector without which we would not be able to bridge the digital divide;
• Development of infrastructure including transport and energy; and • Developing financing mechanism.

Mbeki presented MAP as being spearheaded by a ‘coalition of the willing’.\textsuperscript{69}

Participating African leaders would form a Compact committing them to the programme and a Forum of Leaders who would make decisions about sub-programmes and initiatives and review progress on its implementation. Every attempt will be made by the forum of leaders to be inclusive of all countries that agree to the elements of the Compact.

It is however noticeable that of the original five-member coalition Algeria, Egypt and Nigeria lacked strong democratic credentials.

The IMF and the World Bank were quick to welcome MAP, noting ‘that the areas outlined in the MAP were convergent with the priority areas as seen by the Bank and the Fund.’\textsuperscript{70} When Mbeki visited the UK in June 2001, British Prime Minister Tony Blair promised to assist Mbeki in his efforts to persuade other Western countries to join in ‘a new partnership with Africa’.\textsuperscript{71} The broad support for the new plan outside Africa should come as no surprise as the G8 had participated in the development of MAP.\textsuperscript{72}

In a speech to African ministers of finance in November 2000, KY Amoako, the Executive Secretary of the UN Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) suggested a ‘New Global Compact with Africa’ which would include ‘mutual accountability towards defined outcomes in place of one-sided conditionality’.\textsuperscript{73} A detailed ‘Compact for African Recovery’ was presented by UNECA to ministers of finance in May 2001 as a complement to MAP.\textsuperscript{74}

The draft MAP\textsuperscript{75} was revised by a ‘team of prominent African and international economists’ ahead of the OAU summit in July 2001.\textsuperscript{76} Aspects of the Omega plan, developed by President Wade of Senegal, and the UNECA Compact were incorporated into MAP.\textsuperscript{77} The plan was adopted by the OAU Assembly in July 2001 as the New African Initiative (NAI).\textsuperscript{78} NAI established a Heads of State Implementation Committee (Implementation Committee) with 15 members (later expanded to 20). At the first meeting of the Implementation Committee in October 2001 NAI was renamed the New Partnership for Africa’s Development (NEPAD).

The NEPAD Declaration stated that the new plan ‘differs in its approach and strategy from all previous plans and initiatives in support of Africa’s development, although the problems to be addressed remain largely the same.’ As discussed below these differences in approach are difficult to discern. Increased political will to reform is often highlighted as a critical difference as compared to the past, an implicit recognition that earlier initiatives have been full of rhetoric.

2.3.3 The NEPAD Declaration and Programme of Action

The founding document of NEPAD (NEPAD Declaration) is divided into eight parts: (I) Introduction, (II) Africa in today’s world: Between poverty and prosperity, (III) The new political will of African leaders, (IV) Appeal to the peoples of Africa, (V) Programme of Action, (VI) A new global partnership, (VII) Implementation of the New Partnership for Africa’s Development and (VIII) Conclusion. The Programme of Action is divided into conditions for sustainable development, sectoral priorities and mobilising resources.

The first paragraph of the Declaration sets out that NEPAD is 79 As of July 2008 the members of the NEPAD Implementation Committee were Cameroon, Congo-Brazzaville, DRC, Gabon (Central Africa), Ethiopia, Madagascar, Rwanda, Sudan (East Africa), Egypt, Algeria, Libya, Tunisia (North Africa), South Africa, Namibia, Malawi, Lesotho (Southern Africa), Nigeria, Senegal, Mali, Benin (West Africa). See Decision on the report of the Heads of State and Government Implementation Committee on NEPAD, Doc Assembly/AU/11 (XI), para 11.

a pledge by African leaders, based on a common vision and a firm and shared conviction that [African leaders] have a pressing duty to eradicate poverty and to place their countries … on a path of sustainable growth and development and, at the same time, to participate actively in the world economy and body politic.\textsuperscript{82}

The introduction ends with a call ‘for a new relationship of partnership between Africa and the international community, especially the highly industrialised countries, to overcome the development chasm that has widened over centuries of unequal relations’.\textsuperscript{83} The eight paragraph introduction to the NEPAD Declaration could be summarised as a call for donor support for ideas that the African leaders have come up with on behalf of their subjects.

Part II first deals with Africa’s role as an ‘indispensable resource base’ for the world before turning to the historical reasons for the impoverishment of the continent, namely ‘the legacy of colonialism, the Cold War, the workings of the international economic system, and the inadequacies of and shortcomings in the policies pursued by many countries in the post-independence era.’\textsuperscript{84} Looking to the future, part II finally discusses Africa in the context of globalisation, concluding that ‘[w]hile globalisation has increased the cost of Africa’s ability to compete, we hold that the advantages of an effectively managed integration present the best prospects for future economic prosperity and poverty reduction.’\textsuperscript{85}

In part III, development plans of the past are said to have failed because of ‘a variety of reasons, both internal and external, including questionable leadership and ownership by Africans themselves’.\textsuperscript{86} As has been noted above this recognition of both internal and external reasons for past failures has been recognised in African development plans since the early 1990’s.

\textsuperscript{83} NEPAD para 8.
\textsuperscript{84} NEPAD para 18.
\textsuperscript{85} NEPAD para 28.
\textsuperscript{86} NEPAD para 42.
The leaders hold that ‘there is today a new set of circumstances, which lend themselves to integrated practical implementation’. These ‘new circumstances’ are said to include ‘new concepts of security and self-interest’ in the aftermath of the cold war, the increase of democratically elected leaders on the continent and the AU’s ‘resolve to deal with conflict and censure deviation from the norm’, reinforced by the activities of civil society. African governments are also held to be more resolute about regional economic integration. The UN Millennium Declaration ‘points to the global community’s commitment to enhance resource flows to Africa, by improving aid, trade and debt relationships between Africa and the rest of the world, and by increased private capital flows to the continent.’

Paragraph 47 sets out the importance of national development plans ‘developed through participatory processes’. It is not clear why this principle was not applied to the development of NEPAD itself. In paragraph 49 African leaders ‘take joint responsibility’ to strengthen mechanisms for conflict prevention, promoting and protecting democracy and human rights, establish macroeconomic stability, provide frameworks for financial markets, ‘revitalising and extending’ education and health services, promoting the role of women, capacity building for the maintenance of law and order and developing infrastructure and agriculture.

Part V is the main part of the document, the Programme of Action covering paragraphs 59-170 of the 205 paragraphs long document. Para 67 sets out two long term objectives:

87 NEPAD para 42.
88 NEPAD para 46.
89 Cf criticism of NEPAD discussed below.
90 NEPAD para 67.
• To eradicate poverty in Africa and to place African countries, both individually and collectively, on a path of sustainable growth and development and thus halt the marginalisation of Africa in the globalisation process.
• To promote the role of women in all activities.

Paragraph 68 sets out the goals to ‘achieve and sustain’ a growth rate of 7% per annum over the next 15 years and translate the UN Millennium Development Goals into reality.\(^91\) By using the MDGs as goals, ‘NEPAD is challenging aid donors … to take their commitment to global poverty reduction seriously.’\(^92\)

To realise these goals would according to NEPAD require an additional US$ 64 billion per year. ‘The bulk of the needed resources will have to be obtained from outside the continent,’ in the short and medium term in the form of debt reduction and aid and in the long term in the form of private capital flows.\(^93\) Domestic resources are to be mobilised through increased savings and improved tax collection.\(^94\)

In paragraphs 71-95 the NEPAD Declaration sets out the conditions for sustainable development under three headings: the peace, security initiative, the democracy and political governance initiative, and the economic and corporate governance initiative. The Peace and Security Initiative set out in paragraphs 72-78 has led to the establishment by the AU of the Peace and Security Council.

Under ‘Democracy and Political Governance Initiative’, paragraphs 79-85, it is stated that it ‘is generally acknowledged that development is impossible in the absence of true democracy, respect for human rights, peace and good \(^91\) See also para 46.

\(^93\) NEPAD para 144.
\(^94\) NEPAD para 145.
The objective of the initiative is to strengthen ‘the political and administrative framework of participating countries, in line with the principles of democracy, transparency, accountability, integrity, respect for human rights and the promotion of the rule of law.’\textsuperscript{96} Participation in the initiative is voluntary. The leadership of NEPAD is tasked with identifying ‘appropriate diagnostic and assessment tools, in support of compliance with the shared goals of good governance’.\textsuperscript{97} This formed the basis for the establishment of the African Peer Review Mechanism.\textsuperscript{98} Respect for human rights is seen as instrumental to achieving the goals of NEPAD but not as essential goals in their own right.\textsuperscript{99}

The ‘Economic and Corporate Governance Initiative’ in paragraphs 86-89 has as its objective to ‘promote throughout the participating countries a set of concrete and timebound programmes aimed at enhancing the quality of economic and public financial management, as well as corporate governance.’\textsuperscript{100} Ministries of finance and central banks are asked to help in identifying appropriate standards and codes of good practice. The NEPAD Implementation Committee will then mobilise resources for capacity building. No mention is made of review of compliance with commitments as with the ‘Democracy and Political Governance Initiative’.

The Programme of Action includes priority areas that ‘may be revised from time to time by the Heads of State Implementation Committee’\textsuperscript{101} The sectors included in the Programme of Action are infrastructure (in particular information technology and energy), human resources (including education and reversing the brain drain), health, agriculture and market access in developed countries

\textsuperscript{96} NEPAD para 81.
\textsuperscript{97} NEPAD para 82.
\textsuperscript{98} The idea of the need for ‘peer review’ was recognised early on in the development of the NEPAD Declaration, Interview with Stephen Gelb, 4 June 2009.
\textsuperscript{99} According to Stephen Gelb human rights did not feature prominently in the negotiations over the text of what became the NEPAD Declaration.
\textsuperscript{101} NEPAD para 61.
for African exports.\textsuperscript{102} Detailed objectives and actions with regard to these priority areas are set out in paragraphs 96-170. Programmes dealing with communicable diseases, information and communication technology, debt reduction and market access are to be ‘fast-tracked’.\textsuperscript{103} The focus is on human capital not human capabilities.

Under the heading ‘A new global partnership’ part VI sets out what African leaders see as the ‘responsibilities and obligations’ of developed countries and multilateral institutions.\textsuperscript{104}

Part VII deals with the implementation of NEPAD. The role of the Implementation Committee includes:\textsuperscript{105}

- Identifying strategic issues that need to be researched, planned and managed at the continental level.
- Setting up mechanisms for reviewing progress in the achievement of mutually agreed targets and compliance with mutually agreed standards;
- Reviewing progress in the implementation of past decisions and taking appropriate steps to address problems and delays.

A comparison with the earlier initiatives discussed above makes it clear that there is not much new to NEPAD.\textsuperscript{106} The recognition that economic progress depends on good political governance is important,\textsuperscript{107} but as noted above not new. Indeed, one of the main features of NEPAD is increased aid in response to improved governance, which, as noted above, was also a main feature of UN-NADAF. Another main feature, accountability, was a major theme of the 1990 African Charter for Popular Participation for Development and thereafter reaffirmed in numerous declarations by the OAU Assembly.\footnote{See also Taylor (2005) 27.}

\textsuperscript{103} NEPAD para 186.
\textsuperscript{104} NEPAD para 185.

Thus, if there is something new it is not in the policy prescriptions but in the monitoring of implementation. NEPAD provides for establishing ‘mechanisms for reviewing progress in the achievement of mutually agreed targets and compliance with mutually agreed standards’. By establishing the APRM (described below), the Implementation Committee ostensibly took a major step from rhetorical to practical accountability.\footnote{NEPAD para 201. The establishment of the Implementation Committee was endorsed by the OAU Assembly see Declaration on the New Common Initiative (MAP and OMEGA), AHG/Decl. 1 (XXXVII) para 12.}

2.3.4 Response of the international community

The United Nations has adopted NEPAD as its framework for cooperation with Africa. The support of rich countries, and in particular the international financial institutions, apparently makes NEPAD different from earlier initiatives. However, there is a clear difference between pledging support and actually giving support through increased aid, debt relief and the removal of distorting trade barriers such as subventions. The discrepancy by the developed world in its pledges and its actions was cited as the main failure in the evaluation of UN-NADAF.\footnote{Ad Hoc Committee (2002).}

So far the resource flows under NEPAD have been quite moderate and not at all what NEPADs main proponents had hoped.\footnote{See eg Activity report by Ambassador S Olukorede Willoughby, Acting Chief Executive Officer, NEPAD Secretariat, to the 19th summit of the NEPAD Heads of State and Government Implementation Committee (HSGIC), 29 June 2008, Sharm El Sheikh, Egypt, HSGIC/19/REP-AG: CEO/4, 9.} African governments working together with the NEPAD Secretariat is trying to change this situation inter alia through the Africa Partnership Forum.\footnote{Manby (2007) para 26. The Africa Partnership Forum (APF) meets twice a year since its establishment in November 2003 to discuss 'policy issues, priorities and commitments in support of Africa’s development.' The Forum brings together African government representatives and their development partners belonging to the OECD. At the fifth APF in London in October 2005, the African representatives presented an AU/NEPAD African Action Plan. The Forum agreed to develop a Joint Action Plan 'bringing together the commitments that Africa and its development partners have both made.' (Communiqué issued at the end of the 5th meeting of the Africa Partnership Forum, London 4-5 October 2005). However, such a plan has not yet materialised. A revised version of the AU/NEPAD African Action Plan was presented to the APF in Tokyo in April 2008. The plan sets out costed actions under the following priority areas: infrastructure, agriculture, health, education, science & technology, trade, industry & investment, environment, peace & security, governance, and gender development. (AU/NEPAD African Action Plan, updated final draft version, 28 March 2008). However, development partners noted that the plan needed additional revisions including to identify which projects were already underway, where bottlenecks existed and the exploration of 'alternative and innovative financing'. (Co-chairs summary of the 10th APF, June 2008). For more information see www.africapartnershipforum.org}

2.3.5 Criticism of NEPAD

Much of the ample criticism against NEPAD has centred on the notion that it ‘embraces the forces of neoliberal globalization, and promotes these forces as a cure for Africa’s ills.’\footnote{Civil society Indaba, Johannesburg, Resolution on NEPAD, 4 May 2002, reprinted in P Bond Fanon’s warning: A civil society reader on the New Partnership for Africa’s Development (2005) 33. See also MJ Kankwenda ‘Revisiting the African development trajectory: From LPA to NEPAD’ in Jeggan C Senghor and Nana K Poku Towards Africa’s renewal (2007); L Diamond ‘Promoting real reform in Africa’ in E Gyimah-Boadi (ed) Democratic reform in Africa – The quality of progress (2004) 277.} The initiative is seen as just another application of the ‘Washington consensus’ and a continuation of structural adjustment.\footnote{P Bond Talk left, walk right – South Africa’s frustrated global reforms (2004) 103; Taylor (2005) 94. The ‘Washington consensus’ included fiscal discipline, market determined interest and exchange rates, trade liberalisation and privatisation. See Jennings (2006) 32. For a counter-argument see Mashele (2006) 3-4.} The underlying assumption that ‘integration into global markets solves poverty’ has been much criticised as has other NEPAD prescriptions for achieving development, such as reliance on privatisation and information technology.\footnote{Bond (2005) 11.}
NEPAD has also been criticised for ‘making aid a major factor’.\textsuperscript{116} Underlying this criticism is the view, expressed over seventy years ago, that ‘Africans must realize that he who pays the piper calls the tune ... only through African philanthropy can this continent be saved from its impending doom’.\textsuperscript{117} There is also the risk that aid is diverted for elite consumption and to reinforce a neo-patrimonial system rather than being used for investment.\textsuperscript{118} Some have contented that African states should not compete over conditional foreign direct investment.\textsuperscript{119} It has been argued that an Africa-owned programme should mainly be financed by the participants.\textsuperscript{120}

The main criticism of NEPAD has been that it is a top down initiative adopted without any consultation.\textsuperscript{121} NEPAD is ‘a pledge by African leaders’.\textsuperscript{122} No civil society organisations were consulted in developing the initiative, even though civil society participation in development is recognised as essential in the NEPAD Declaration. This lack of consultation in drafting the plan must be seen as one of its major weaknesses.\textsuperscript{123}

In an interview in July 2001, shortly after the adoption of NAI, Mbeki said that ‘these are not matters which can be confined to governments. The people have to be involved. What we will do here, is to ensure that there is that popular participation.'

This is also reflected in the NEPAD Declaration that provides that the ‘agenda is based on national and regional priorities and development plans that must be prepared through participatory processes involving the people.’

Nevertheless it has been argued that NEPAD does not provide for sufficient interaction with civil society. It must also be kept in mind that the 205 paragraph NEPAD Declaration is not all there is to NEPAD. Strategies have been adopted in a number of fields, such as health, environment and agricultural policy. Unfortunately, lack of consultation continues to be a problem in developing these initiatives.

NEPAD has also been criticised for having achieved little since it was adopted and for claiming ‘credit for virtually every development project on the continent’, even projects that were conceived long before NEPAD. The vagueness of NEPAD is a major weakness:

The Nepad text and even its sectoral documents fall far short of any common sense definition of a plan or a strategy. They organise the many African development problems into a structure, but offer no guide about which problems must be solved first. The Nepad text and subsequent documents say nothing about how, given the many priorities competing for scarce resources, governments should choose strategically from those competing priorities. They also offer wish lists but fail to note how funds will be raised or how the proffered solutions would do more than tinker expensively around the margins.

125 NEPAD para 47.

126 Bond (2005) 3.

The public perception of NEPAD is also not helped by the fact that public relations and information do not seem to have been high on the agenda.\footnote{For example by the end of December 2008 the latest news item on the NEPAD web site, www.nepad.org, was from June 2007. However, in an interview in December 2008, Bankole Adeoye, coordinator: external relations & partnerships of NEPAD indicated that this issue was being attended to and a new web site would be launched in January. A revamped web page was finally launched in July 2009 with much relevant information still missing.}

With regard to human rights the NEPAD Declaration has been criticised for the lack of a rights-based approach to development: ‘NEPAD’s endorsement of human rights … is segregated from its discussion of objectives in relation to infrastructure, health, education, and other areas.’\footnote{Manby (2004) 1003. See also CJ Doebbler ‘A complex ambiguity: The relationship between the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights and other African Union initiatives affecting respect for human rights’ (2003) 13 Transnational Law and Contemporary Problems 7. Stephen Gelb one of the main drafters of NEPAD confirmed in an interview that human rights was not something that the drafters gave much thought in the drafting process. Interview with Stephen Gelb, Pretoria, 4 June 2009. It is noticeable that NEPAD was mainly developed by economists. Gumedze (2006) 153 is of the opinion that NEPAD ‘is an initiative aimed at providing an environment that is conducive to the promotion and protection of human rights in Africa by fostering the right to development through a number of strategies.’ Gumedze further notes that NEPAD should not be considered in isolation, 157. For an analysis of the human rights rhetoric in the NEPAD Declaration see Gumedze, 157-164.} Issues of discrimination and systematic violations do not get sufficient attention in the NEPAD Declaration. For example no mention is made of ethnic discrimination despite the consequences such discrimination has had on the continent.\footnote{Manby (2004) 1005.} Gender and HIV and AIDS are inadequately addressed in NEPAD.\footnote{De Waal (2002) 473, 475, Taylor (2005) 127-151. On the impact of AIDS on African governance see A De Waal ‘How will HIV/AIDS transform African governance?’ (2003) 102 African Affairs 1-23.}
2.4 Concluding remarks

This chapter has illustrated that NEPAD is one in a long line of African development plans with similar policy prescriptions. The focus is on economic growth. Human rights are seemingly included mostly for rhetorical effect as in earlier development plans. The references to democracy in the NEPAD Declaration are not reflected in African reality. While most African leaders today seek endorsement from elections the idea that democracy is more than regular elections with given outcomes is still to take hold among many African leaders. Perhaps even more importantly, as discussed above, NEPAD is premised on the existence of a type of state that is rare in Africa where most states still display clear neo-patrimonial tendencies.¹³⁴

The response of donors to NEPAD has been warm as far as statements go, but colder when it comes to actual assistance in the form of trade concessions and more development assistance. Similarly, African leaders have in general been slow to implement the admittedly vague commitments contained in the NEPAD framework document. Does this mean that NEPAD is just another development plan that will be forgotten in a decade when all the talk will be of a new acronym as yet unborn? Only time will tell.

Two factors have often been mentioned as contributing to the negative performance of development plans of the past. These are lack of popular participation in designing and implementing development plans and the lack of monitoring compliance with commitments. Before tackling how the APRM deals with these issues the next chapter will examine how the APRM came into being and its mandate.

CHAPTER 3
THE APRM MANDATE AND HUMAN RIGHTS

3.1 Introduction

The main question this chapter seeks to answer is: What is the APRM meant to achieve? The formative stages of the APRM are considered and the mandate of the APRM is set out. The main focus of the chapter is on the role human rights plays in the APRM framework.

3.2 Developing the APRM

3.2.1 The need for monitoring

Inadequate monitoring was identified as one of the reasons for the failure of the various development initiatives discussed in the previous chapter. For the drafters of the various initiatives that were finally adopted as NEPAD it was thus clear that monitoring was necessary. The question was which form it should take.

3.2.2 The concept of peer review

The word peer derives from the Latin word par, meaning equal. Most people, at least in academia, associate ‘peer review’ with the review process by which articles submitted to academic journals are scrutinised by experts in the field before being accepted for publication.

Peer review as discussed in this study refers to a number of mechanisms for international monitoring of compliance with agreed norms. This form of peer review is relatively new and has been used mainly by international organisations in the economic field.¹ In a paper by the Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), the organisation that has been a pioneer in this field, peer review is defined as a method by which countries can assess the quality and effectiveness of their policies, legislation, policy environments and key institutions. It provides a forum where policies can be explained and discussed, where information can be sought and concerns expressed, on a non-confrontational and non-adversarial basis. The feedback provides the reviewee with a yardstick for measuring its system against those of other peers while also informing the reviewing countries.²

Most peer review systems share the following characteristics:³ A questionnaire is sent out to the national government which conduct a self-evaluation report. Some peer review systems use cycles of review where each cycle deals with a different aspect of the standard under review. Interviews are conducted with government representatives and in many instances with representatives of civil society and the private sector. The interviews are often conducted as part of a country visit. A country report is prepared by civil servants from other member states of the organisation conducting the review or by staff of the secretariat of the organisation. The country report is discussed in a meeting between government representatives and the monitoring body, composed of government representatives of the other countries of the organisation conducting the review. The report with its recommendations is thereafter published, though publication in some review systems requires the consent of the reviewed country.

¹ Peer review as a method of inducing compliance with agreed norms is further discussed in chapter 5.
3.2.3 Peer review of African countries

Some African states have undergone voluntary sectoral peer reviews before the creation of the APRM. For example South Africa is an ‘enhanced engagement country’ of the OECD and has undergone peer reviews with regard to competition law and policy and education policy. The UN Conference on Trade and Development (UNCTAD) has conducted Investment Policy Reviews of 16 African countries.

Some of the organisations that conduct peer reviews or similar reviews have a global membership. The IMF reviews around 130 countries in a year through Article IV consultations. Less than two hours is devoted to a report and representatives of the reviewed country are not present during the review meeting. The dominating role of the IMF in surveillance of macroeconomic policies has often been criticised, leading to calls for peer review at the regional level.

7 To the extent that the IMF can pressure countries to follow its advice through economic means the review cannot be considered a peer review. As stated by Kanbur: ‘[i]t is in rich countries, where IMF resources are not used, that the Article IV consultations tend to play the same role as OECD peer reviews. In these countries, the visit of an IMF mission, and the subsequent report, is one among a number of assessments of the economy, produced by domestic and international entities (including in the latter, OECD peer reviews). There is a vibrant and domestic dialogue which the IMF Article IV consultation feeds into and makes a contribution—the final policy decisions of the governments are influenced by, not determined by, the IMF review. This is a very different picture from poor countries where IMF resources are often in play. There are program missions, conditionalities of the program, and the IMF’s assessment is almost invariably the gateway to resource flow from private and public sources.’ R Kanbur ‘The African Peer Review Mechanism (APRM): An assessment of concept and design’ (2004).

Peer review that does not directly deal with African countries can have an indirect effect. The most prominent example of this is the peer review of donor countries in the OECD Development Assistance Committee.

Different systems of peer review are further discussed in chapter 5 focusing on impact and similarities and differences with the APRM.

3.2.4 Constructing the APRM

The idea

Parallel to the development of NEPAD as described in the previous chapter, two economists drafted a paper on an implementation framework where the idea of peer review was first mooted.\(^9\) However, no agreement could be reached on this proposal among the five initiating states of NEPAD.\(^10\)

In the context of NEPAD, the term ‘peer review’ first appeared publicly in the Compact for African Recovery in April 2001.\(^11\) The Compact sets out four principles that should guide the development framework: African ownership, stable long-term resource flows to Africa, transformed partnership based on mutual accountability and recognition of Africa’s diversity.\(^12\) Mutual accountability should be achieved through ‘peer review and performance monitoring among both African countries and international partners’.\(^13\)

\(^9\) Interview with Stephen Gelb, Pretoria, 4 June 2009. Mr Gelb was himself one of the drafters of this paper.

\(^10\) As above.

\(^11\) Adopted by the UN Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA), see chapter 2.

\(^12\) Compact for African Recovery paras 21-25.

\(^13\) The main donor countries, making up the OECD, have for long monitored the development assistance policies of each other through the Development Assistance Committee (DAC) peer review. Mutual monitoring would have addressed the fact that the solution to the African predicament lies both in the hands of the African people and its leaders and in the hands of the countries that dominate the world economy. Such an approach would recognise that: ‘The structure of African statehood certainly contributed to the dismal record of African economies, just as the structure of African involvement in global production and trade helped to induce political alienation and institutional decay.’
Compact saw as one of the main functions of the MAP Forum (which became the NEPAD Implementation Committee) to ensure ‘broad-based buy-in by African governments to peer review of performance on issues of governance and economic management.’ The Compact noted that such ‘monitoring has relevance not only for reporting purposes, but also for identifying constraints and taking corrective measures.’ Some human rights indicators were included among the ‘performance indices proposed in the Compact.’

At their meeting in Algiers in May 2001 African ministers of finance and ministers of economic development and planning held that a ‘dialogue on governance in Africa will allow us to share lessons and experiences, identifying capacity needs and best practices.’ The ministers declared their willingness to participate in peer reviews.

MAP was more vague than the Compact in its considerations of implementation measures providing that African leaders should take responsibility for monitoring implementation. As noted in the previous chapter, the NEPAD

Declaration sets out as one of the functions of the Implementation Committee to set up ‘mechanisms for reviewing progress in the achievement of mutually agreed targets and compliance with mutually agreed standards.’\(^{19}\) Despite peer review not being mentioned explicitly in the NEPAD Declaration it is clear that the principle of peer review as conceived in the Compact was implicitly recognised.\(^{20}\)

At the initiative of the UN Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) a meeting between the ministers of finance and development planning of 13 African countries and the ministers of development cooperation of nine OECD countries was held in Amsterdam from 14 to 16 October 2001.\(^{21}\) The discussion focused on governance, aid effectiveness and ‘the Africa [sic] Peer Review Process’. It was agreed that the ‘intended objective’ should be

\text{to encourage mutual learning, monitor progress towards agreed goals, apply peer pressure on governments to adhere to agreed standards and benchmarks ... disseminate good practices, identify capacity gaps and recommend approaches for addressing these gaps.} \quad ^{22}\]

The African participants at the meeting felt that taking into account the various review processes underway such as the IMF’s Article IV consultations, the World Bank’s Country Policy and Institutional Assessment (CPIA), the niche for an African Peer Review Process might be for it to focus on the key features of the capable state; namely the capacity of the state to safeguard peace and security for its citizens, secure an enabling environment for sustained growth and poverty reduction, and facilitate the role of the private sector in development.\textsuperscript{23}

\textit{Developing the mandate}

At its first meeting on 23 October 2001 in Abuja, Nigeria, the NEPAD Implementation Committee decided that ‘African leaders should set up parameters for Good Governance to guide their activities at both the political and economic levels’ and that it would at its next meeting ‘consider and adopt an appropriate peer review mechanism and a code of conduct’.\textsuperscript{24} A Sub-Committee of Heads of State and Government led by President Mbeki was tasked with drafting a ‘protocol … defining what is acceptable and what is unacceptable behaviour on the part of all our governments.’\textsuperscript{25} In an answer to a question in the South African Parliament, President Mbeki stated that the Implementation Committee ‘emphasised the need for peer review of government activities on the continent, to ensure that we act collectively and successfully to address issues of democracy, of human rights, of peace and stability.’\textsuperscript{26}

A ‘draft report on good governance and democracy as well as an African Peer Review Mechanism (APRM)’ was presented to the Implementation Committee

\textsuperscript{25} Reply by President Mbeki to question by Dr PWA Mulder (FF), National Assembly, 24 October 2001, reprinted in T Mbeki Africa define yourself (2002) 261. The word ‘protocol’ seems to indicate that a binding instrument was foreseen.

at its meeting in March 2002. It was ‘strongly supported’ by the Committee which stressed that:27

An effective African Peer Review Mechanism, designed, owned and managed by Africans, must be credible, transparent and all-encompassing, so as to demonstrate that African leaders are fully aware of their responsibilities and obligations to their peoples, and are genuinely prepared to engage and relate to the rest of the world on the basis of integrity and mutual respect. It, therefore, mandated the Steering Committee to finalise the Report for adoption at its next meeting.

At the same meeting the Committee approved ‘draft codes and standards for economic and corporate governance for Africa’.28 It was decided that a suggestion for an African Peer Review Mechanism with regard to these issues should be reviewed ‘by an independent, credible African institution, separate from the political process and structures.’29

In May 2002 ministers from the OECD countries met ministers from Algeria, Egypt, Nigeria, Senegal and South Africa to discuss NEPAD. It was decided to have further dialogue including ‘exchanging views and experience on peer review mechanisms and the requirements necessary for African countries to effectively apply them.’30

The NEPAD Implementation Committee meeting in Rome on 11 June 2002 adopted the Declaration on Democracy, Political, Economic and Corporate Governance.

At the Summit in Durban in July 2002 the Assembly of the new African Union ‘encouraged’ AU members to ‘adopt’ the Governance Declaration and accede to the APRM.\textsuperscript{34} It also ‘mandated’ the Implementation Committee to further elaborate the NEPAD framework and ensure implementation of the initial action plan.\textsuperscript{35} A workshop convened by the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights on the fringes of the July 2002 Summit noted that ‘[h]uman rights indicators need to be developed and used strategically in the APRM’s evaluation process.’\textsuperscript{36}

In October 2002 President Mbeki indicated that the APRM should be confined to economic and corporate governance as the AU had institutions in place to deal with political governance.\textsuperscript{37} The debate was however short lived as on 3 of the 53 AU member states had signed the MOU.\footnote{Cape Verde was to have signed the MOU at the APRM Forum on 30 June 2009, thereby making it the 30th state to have signed up for review. However, at the time of writing it was unclear whether the President of Cape Verde had actually signed the MOU. See S Gruzd ‘APRM Forum in Libya: Few surprises, unanswered questions’, 3 July 2009, www.saiia.org.za/diplomatic-pouch/aprm-forum-in-libya-few-surprises-unanswered-questions.html (accessed 14 July 2009).} The MOU, the Governance Declaration and the APRM Base Document are the basic instruments that guide the APRM process. As will be discussed below and in the following chapter a number of other documents have been adopted to guide the review process.

\textit{CSSDCA – a discarded alternative peer review process}

At the same time as the NEPAD peer review process was being developed, work was underway on developing a Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) which would give effect to the Conference on Security, Stability, Development and Co-operation in Africa (CSSDCA) Solemn Declaration. The Solemn Declaration had been adopted by the OAU Assembly in July 2000 and provided for an implementation mechanism which would include regular review meetings.\footnote{CSSDCA Solemn Declaration, AHG/Decl.4 (XXXVI) (2000) para 15.} Experts meeting in December 2001 and May 2002 adopted MOUs on the Development and Cooperation Calabashes and the Security and Stability Calabashes. The MOUs were merged into the Memorandum of Understanding on Security, Stability, Development and Cooperation in Africa which was adopted by the OAU Assembly in July 2002.\footnote{Decision on the Conference on Security, Stability, Development and Cooperation (CSSDCA), AHG.Dec 175 (XXXVIII); Report of the Secretary-General on the Implementation of the CSSDCA, Council of Ministers (Seventy-sixth Ordinary Session/Eleventh Ordinary Session of the AEC), 28 June – 6 July 2002, Durban, South Africa, www.africa-union.org/Special_Programs/CSSDCA/cssdca-implementation.pdf (accessed 14 July 2009).} The CSSDCA MOU provided for a peer review process separate from the APRM. The CSSDCA unit in the AU Commission was mandated to elaborate a comprehensive work programme and time schedule for its activities including administrative arrangements for overseeing the monitoring process, with diagnostic tools and measurement criteria for assessing performance, as well as deficiencies and capacity restraints that impede them. All stakeholders in providing inputs for the review process will use the diagnostic tools and measurement criteria and highlight capacity restraints or gaps that should be bridged to enable higher standards of performance along with resources that should be mobilised to support this process. This process of peer scrutiny will facilitate the development of best practices and suggest ways in which they can be effectively transferred to where they are not in operation.47

The Solemn Declaration provided for a Standing Conference of Heads of State and Government to meet every second year. The MOU stated that the process should be ‘supported by visitation panels composed of eminent, reputable Africans to carry out professional, independent and objective spot assessments in two-year circles as part of the preparation for the bi-annual Standing Conference.’48 As will be shown in the next chapter this process clearly resembled the APRM process as set out in the APRM Base Document. The main difference was the vaguer goals in the Governance Declaration as compared to the CSSDCA MOU with its time-bound goals and indicators, and that the APRM process would be voluntary49 as opposed to the CSSDCA process which would apply to all AU members. Many criticised the overlapping processes and in the end the CSSDCA peer review system was never implemented.50

3.3 Purpose and mandate

By signing the MOU participating states undertake to take ‘all necessary steps to facilitate the development and implementation of a national Programme of Action … to improve our performance in the areas of governance and socio-economic development as stipulated in the African Peer Review Mechanism Base Document.’51

The primary purpose of the APRM as set out in the APRM Base Document is to foster the adoption of policies, standards and practices that lead to political stability, high economic growth, sustainable development and accelerated sub-regional and continental economic integration through sharing of experiences and reinforcement of successful and best practice, including identifying deficiencies, and assessing the needs for capacity building.52

The underlying assumption is that one set of ‘policies, standards and practices’ is applicable to every country, non-regarding different experiences. This is in particular perilous with regard to economic policy.53

It is noteworthy that democracy and respect for human rights are not seen as purposes of the APRM, but as tools to be used to achieve the purpose set out above. In this the basic framework documents of the APRM are similar to the NEPAD framework document as discussed in chapter 2.

The APRM Base Document sets out the following mandate of the APRM:

The mandate of the African Peer Review Mechanism is to ensure that the policies and practices of participating states conform to the agreed political, economic and corporate governance values, codes and standards contained in the Declaration

51 MOU para 21.
52 APRM Base Document para 3; MOU para 8. on Democracy, Political, Economic and Corporate Governance. The APRM is the mutually agreed instrument for self-monitoring by the participating member governments.\(^{54}\)

This can be compared to the mandate as set out in the MOU:

[T]o encourage participating States in ensuring that the policies and practices of participating States conform to the agreed political, economic and corporate governance values, codes and standards, and achieve mutually agreed objectives in socio-economic development contained in the Declaration on Democracy, Political, Economic and Corporate Governance.\(^{55}\)

The MOU as the document actually signed by participating states takes precedence over the Base Document. This is significant as the emphasis in the APRM Base Document is to ‘ensure’ conformity while the emphasis in the MOU is on ‘encourage’. The weaker language of the MOU ostensibly represents a weakening of the APRM, in line with the move from what was proposed to be a legally binding treaty, the Accord on the African Peer Review Mechanism, to the ‘softer’ framework of the MOU.\(^{56}\)

The wording of the MOU seems to indicate that the ‘agreed’ values, codes and standards with regard to political, economic and corporate governance, and the objectives with regard to socio-economic development, are those contained in the Governance Declaration. Participating states may agree on additional values, codes, standards and objectives to be monitored by the APRM. The NEPAD Implementation Committee adopted a document entitled ‘Objectives, Standards, Criteria and Indicators for the African Peer Review Mechanism’ (OSCI) in March 2003. OSCI was expanded into a document entitled ‘Country Self-Assessment for the African Peer Review Mechanism’, popularly known as the Questionnaire. At its meeting in February 2004 the APRM Forum of Heads of State and Government took note of the Questionnaire and requested that it be forwarded to all participating countries. Participating countries are allowed to adapt the Questionnaire to local circumstances.

In preparing the Questionnaire a technical experts meeting was held, but according to one of the participants the 'draft that has been prepared bears only modest resemblance to the experts’ recommendations.' Some of the questions in the experts’ recommendations that had been left out related to freedom of association, the right of the opposition to access state media and Parliament’s role in ensuring an accountable executive. At the time of writing the Questionnaire is being reviewed as part of the revision of the APRM framework documents.

OSCI lists objectives, discussed further below, under each of the four governance areas: democracy and political governance, economic governance and management, corporate governance and socio-economic development. Under each objective OSCI lists standards, indicative criteria and example of indicators. Indicative criteria are framed as questions as to ‘whether the government has taken the necessary steps to achieve the objective and attain the standards’. Indicators ‘are used as the means by which it is determined whether the criteria have been met’. In the Questionnaire OSCI’s ‘indicative criteria’ has been renamed ‘questions’, while the term ‘indicator’ remains. OSCI and the Questionnaire set out a number of additional international instruments that are not listed in the Governance Declaration.

59 The Questionnaire refers to ‘good’ political governance.
60 OSCI para 1.10.
61 OSCI para 1.10.
OSCI and the Questionnaire can be seen to expand the issues covered and codes and standards monitored compared to the briefer Governance Declaration. However, as will be discussed below, the Governance Declaration itself includes many open-ended formulations which could be used by the APRM Panel to include many codes and standards that are not explicitly incorporated into the APRM framework, for example because they were adopted after the APRM framework documents were adopted.62

3.4 Indicators and benchmarking

The UNDP Human Development Report 2000, with the theme human rights and human development, states that: ‘Statistical indicators are a powerful tool in the struggle for human rights’.63 In a background paper to the report, Green defines a human rights indicator as ‘a piece of information used in measuring the extent to which a legal right is being fulfilled or enjoyed in a given situation’.64

According to Tomaševski ‘[t]o measure the performance of governments one needs to define what governments are required to do, and then compare this against what they are willing and able to do, demonstrated by their efforts and accomplishments.’65

62 The South African Institute of International Affairs has made an attempt to collect what it calls the APRM governance standards, see South African Institute of International Affairs APRM governance standards – An indexed collection (2007). The 600-page collection includes the instruments specifically mentioned in the Governance Declaration, OSCI and the Questionnaire with the exception of the Report on the World Summit for Social Development (too lengthy), International Accounting Standards and the King Report on Corporate Governance (copyright), ILO and WHO standards (APRM makes general reference without specifying which standards apply). The compilation includes the African Charter on Democracy, Elections and Governance which was adopted in 2007, but not for example the African Youth Charter which was adopted in 2006.

64 M Green ‘What we talk about when we talk about indicators: Current approaches to human rights measurement’ (2001) 23 Human Rights Quarterly 1062-1097 1065.

Indicators can be quantitative (statistical) or qualitative, and relate to outcome or process. Outcome indicators are generally quantitative. Process indicators are often qualitative but can also be quantitative (e.g., resource allocation). Both types of indicators are used by human rights monitoring bodies with regard to both socio-economic rights and civil and political rights. It can also be useful to distinguish ‘between indicators of the will by states to implement the rights and indicators of their degree of achievement in relation to capacity.’

Kirby is of the view that at the national level the prerequisite for protection of human rights is independent courts and ‘an independent legal profession which has the courage to bring difficult and unpopular cases to the courts’. Other institutional arrangements, such as national human rights institutions, if effective and approachable, also work as positive indicators. A free media is also an important human rights indicator. But as pointed out by Kirby: ‘the intangible sense of freedom which derives from general respect for human rights is resistant to mathematical measurement’. The exception may be economic and social outcome indicators which are mainly used in the development context, but also provide important human rights indicators.

Indicators can be used in different ways. Some studies have made ranking-lists of country compliance with various aspects of human rights and democratisation. The UNDP created a Human Freedom Index (HFI) to complement its Human Development Index. It was discontinued because it was based on qualitative judgments rather than quantifiable data. Kirby rightly notes that ‘[e]veryone has his or her own notions of what freedoms are important and how they should be weighted in the scale of things’. Indicators are probably more useful in measuring changes over time in one country.

With regard to standards and codes the indicators in the APRM Questionnaire relate to ratification of treaties and legislative and policy measures adopted to comply with the listed instruments. Easily measurable indicators with regard to international human rights treaties such as reporting status and acceptance of individual complaint mechanisms are not included. Challenges experienced in implementing standards and codes are also listed as indicators.

Process indicators under the objectives can be divided into those dealing with underlying causes to the problems facing a specific country (eg ‘factors that cause or are potential sources of conflicts’), and legislative and policy measures to address the situation and resource allocation (budgeting).

Outcome indicators for example call on participants to ‘[p]rovide evidence of improved broad participation’. Statistical outcome indicators (eg ‘[g]rowth in employment per sector for the past 5 years’), which are absent from the section on Democracy and Political Governance, are included in the sections on Economic Governance, Corporate Governance, and Socio-economic Development.

In determining which indicators to use criteria such as collectability, accuracy and comparability must be considered. It is not always clear whether the APRM indicators, in particular the outcome indicators live up to these criteria. From a human rights perspective it is important to have disaggregated statistical data so that discriminatory practices are not hidden away under the guise of a national average. This is recognised in the APRM Questionnaire which calls for ‘[s]ocial indicators disaggregated by gender, rural and urban areas’. The different methods to collect the data will be discussed in the next chapter.

After the data has been collected the result should be measured against benchmarks. An example of an international benchmark is the pledge by African leaders in the Abuja Declaration on HIV/AIDS, tuberculosis and other related infectious diseases adopted by the OAU in 2001 that governments should allocate ‘at least 15% of our annual budget to the improvement of the health sector’. There is no mention of this declaration in the APRM framework documents.

More important than internationally agreed benchmarks are national benchmarks. The APRM process should identify existing national benchmarks and identify new ones in the POA. Specific time-bound targets with actions aimed at realising human rights should be included in the POA. The measures taken should ‘prioritise the needs of the most disadvantaged and marginalized’. Progressive realisation ‘means that there should … be continuing movement towards the next target on the road to ultimate fulfilment.’

The APRM has a focus on best practices. These should not only be used to congratulate a country under review on a work well done but also when appropriate be seriously considered by other countries being reviewed.

3.5 The human rights mandate of the APRM

3.5.1 The Governance Declaration

The Governance Declaration identifies the ‘eradication of poverty and the fostering of socio-economic development, in particular, through democracy and good governance’ as the most urgent of the ‘grave challenges’ facing Africa.

The Declaration is divided into five parts: Preamble, Democracy and Good Political Governance, Economic and Corporate Governance, Socio-Economic Development and the African Peer Review Mechanism.

In the Preamble the ‘participating Heads of State and Government’ of the AU reaffirms their ‘full and continuing commitment’ to a number of listed treaties and declarations. The following treaties are explicitly mentioned in the Declaration:

- African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights
- African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child
- Abuja Treaty establishing the African Economic Community

89 Fredman (2008) 83.
90 Para 5.
• Protocol on the Establishment of an African Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights
• Constitutive Act of the African Union
• UN Charter
• Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women

The Declaration also makes reference to the Universal Declaration on Human Rights ‘and all conventions relating thereto’. The Governance Declaration specifically mentions the following declarations adopted by the OAU:

• Lagos Plan of Action for the Economic Development of Africa (1980)
• Declaration on the Political and Socio-Economic Situation in Africa and the Fundamental Changes Taking Place in the World (1990)
• Cairo Declaration Establishing the Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution (1993)
• Grand Bay Declaration and Plan of Action for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights (1999)

The member states also reaffirm their ‘full and continuing commitment’ to the African Charter for Popular Participation in Development (1990) and the Beijing Declaration. The Governance Declaration makes no distinction between treaties and declarations, instead dividing the list between regional and UN instruments. Thus it refers to ‘We, member states parties to the aforementioned instruments’ also with regard to non-binding declarations. In particular the inclusion of the African Charter for Popular Participation in Development is interesting as it was adopted at a conference that included representatives of governments, NGOs and UN agencies.\textsuperscript{91}

The ‘full and continuing commitment’ is not limited to the listed instruments but includes ‘other decisions of our continental organization, as well as the other international obligations and undertakings into which we have entered in the context of the United Nations.’ The formulation ‘We, member states parties to the aforementioned instruments’ indicates that signing the MOU does not give rise to obligations under treaties listed to which the state is not a party.

The APRM differs from many other monitoring bodies in that it is given a mandate to monitor not only compliance with its founding instrument, but with a number of other instruments, including all OAU/AU ‘decisions’ and all UN ‘undertakings’.\textsuperscript{92} The inclusion of instruments for which monitoring mechanisms already exists, such as the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights, raises particular problems with regard to how the APRM organs should interact with these other bodies, further discussed in chapter 5.

The Governance Declaration is divided into three main headings: political governance, economic and corporate governance, and socio-economic development. In the following the structure of the Questionnaire, with corporate governance as a separate category, will be followed to set out how human rights are treated in the document that forms the basis for self-assessments and country review reports.

3.5.2 Democracy and political governance

Under the heading ‘Democracy and Good Political Governance’ in the Governance Declaration the Heads of State and Government renew their determination to enforce the rule of law, the equality of all citizens before the law and the liberty of the individual; individual and collective freedoms, including the right to form and join political parties and trade unions, in conformity with the constitution; equality of opportunity for all; the inalienable right of the individual to participate by means of free, credible and democratic political processes in periodically electing their leaders for a fixed term of office; and adherence to the separation of powers, including the protection of the independence of the judiciary and of effective parliaments.93

Commitments are also undertaken to combat corruption,94 build capacity for conflict prevention,95 ‘to do more to advance the cause of human rights in Africa generally and, specifically, to end the moral shame exemplified by the plight of women, children, the disabled and ethnic minorities in conflict situation in Africa’96 and to ‘ensure that women have every opportunity to contribute on terms of full equality to political and socio-economic development in all our countries.’97 Seemingly there is recognition of the intrinsic value of human rights, but there is no discussion of socio-economic rights.

Paragraphs 12 to 15 set out an action plan with regard to political governance which include ensuring democracy and accountable governance in national constitutions, promoting the free and fair participation of all citizens in the political process, strengthen electoral commissions and provide the necessary resources for free and fair elections, heighten public awareness of the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights, provide for an ‘accountable, efficient and effective civil service’, ensuring the effective functioning of ‘parliaments and other accountability institutions’, ensure judicial independence, facilitate development of a vibrant civil society and ensuring ‘responsible freedom of expression.’ The participating states should also ‘adopt clear codes, standards and indicators of good governance at the national, sub-regional and continental levels’, support the African Commission and Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights and adhere to AU decisions aimed at promoting democracy, good governance and peace and security.

OSCI identified nine ‘key objectives’ under Democracy and Political Governance:

1. Prevent and reduce intra- and inter-country conflicts
2. Constitutional democracy, including periodic political competition and opportunity for choice, the rule of law, a Bill of Rights and the supremacy of the constitution are firmly established in the constitution.
3. Promotion and protection of economic, social, cultural, civil and political rights as enshrined in all African and international human rights instruments
4. Uphold the separation of powers including the protection of the independence of the judiciary and of an effective Parliament
5. Ensure accountable, efficient and effective public office holders and civil servants
6. Fighting corruption in the political sphere
7. Promotion and protection of the rights of women
8. Promotion and protection of the rights of the child and young persons
9. Promotion and protection of the rights of vulnerable groups, including displaced persons and refugees

Under each objective OSCI lists some relevant standards, indicative criteria (questions) and indicators. The Questionnaire calls the promotion of democracy and good political governance ‘the main objective of the APRM’. The introduction to this part of the Questionnaire sets out three broad categories:

- A guaranteed framework for equal citizen rights (objectives 1-4)
- Institutions of representative and accountable government (objectives 5-6)
- A vibrant civil society (objectives 7-9)

It is questionable whether such a division is justifiable considering that the issues are very much interlinked. For example, women’s rights in objective 7 are clearly relevant for ‘equal citizens rights’. However, at least there is indication that human rights discourse, including the interrelatedness of different rights, has had some influence over the development of the Questionnaire as exemplified by the fact that the first category is held to include ‘issues such as access to justice, respect for the rule of law, the freedoms of expression, association and assembly, as well as the basic economic and social rights to enable citizens to exercise these freedoms effectively.’

The Questionnaire follows the same structure as OSCI, though standards and codes are listed in the beginning of the section with the applicable objective in parenthesis after the name of the instrument.

The question on ‘standards and codes’ is: ‘To what extent has the country taken measures to sign, ratify, adopt and comply with these standards?’ It is clear from the indicators listed that ‘adopt’ means ‘legislative, policy or institutional’ measures to implement the international instrument. Participating state are also asked to outline ‘challenges experienced and the steps taken to address shortfalls and capacity constraints.’ Participants are also asked to provide ‘any official evaluation and assessments’ undertaken by the country and ‘any other surveys or reviews’ which ‘may usefully contribute to the country’s self-assessment.’ Findings of human rights monitoring bodies, at the national and international level, clearly have a role to play here. However, as will be shown in the case studies in chapters 6-8, the focus with regard to standards in the reviews which have been undertaken has been on whether treaties have been ratified and procedural aspects, such as state reporting has been complied with. Substantive issues have been dealt with under the various objectives as set out in the Questionnaire.

Human rights are explicitly considered under objective 2 dealing with constitutional democracy (‘outline the individual and collective political rights and mechanisms and institutions to protect them’), objective 4 dealing with separation of powers (independence of the judiciary), objective 7 on the promotion and protection of the rights of women, objective 8 on the promotion and protection of the rights of children and young persons and objective 9 dealing with the promotion and protection of the rights of vulnerable groups. However, the omnibus clause on human rights is objective 3 dealing with the ‘promotion and protection of economic, social and cultural rights, civil and political rights as enshrined in African and international human rights instruments.’ There are two questions under this objective:

1. What measures have been put in place to promote and protect economic, social, cultural, civil and political rights?
2. What steps have been taken to facilitate equal access to justice for all?

The indicators under question 1 call on participants to identify relevant legal provisions and assess the effectiveness of the provisions and mechanisms put in place to promote and protect human rights rights. Major court cases from the last five years dealing with citizens rights and liberties should be discussed.

The indicators on access to justice include legal provisions and institutions, fees, proximity of courts, legal education, legal aid, alternative dispute resolution mechanisms, training, monitoring and evaluation. Participants are asked to provide any official assessment of the justice system.

While the questions and indicators in the Questionnaire raise many important issues others are left out. For example under objective 1, prevention and reduction of conflicts it would have been beneficial to also consider issues of international humanitarian law and efforts against impunity. Another issue which is left out of the Questionnaire is the obligation to ‘foster a free and independent media’.

3.5.3 Economic governance

The role of the APRM in the realization of human rights is not limited to the explicit discussions of human rights under political governance. Economic governance is essentially about how to provide opportunities for people to provide for themselves and how to obtain the necessary resources to fulfil the responsibilities of the government.

Wenar has noted that ‘responsibility for averting threats to basic well-being should be located in the agent who can most easily avert the threat’. In the context of securing an adequate standard of living he states that ‘[w]hen resources and opportunities are generally available, each person has primary responsible for doing what he can to provide himself with adequate food, clothing, shelter, and so on.”\textsuperscript{107} If opportunities are not available one must “step back” to the next level of responsibility. If the ‘next level’ is ‘unwilling or unable to take responsibility’ another level of responsibility is engaged. Wenar sets out the following levels of responsibility with regard to severe poverty: individual, family, local community, national government and the international community.\textsuperscript{108} The duties of a government of course extend much further than this: creating and enforcing regulatory frameworks, providing infrastructure and service delivery etc. All of this requires resources which in line with NEPAD should preferably be generated from within the state.

The Governance Declaration sets out that good economic and corporate governance are prerequisites for promoting economic growth and reducing poverty.\textsuperscript{109} Economic policies determine how much resources are available in a country and can help improve levels of employment, thus allowing people to provide for themselves. However, not all would agree with the policy prescription in the Governance Declaration that governments should ‘concentrate on the development of infrastructure and the creation of a macro-economic environment’ while leaving the private sector to ‘be the veritable engine of economic growth.’\textsuperscript{110} Issues such as these should be open to democratic contestation. A human rights based approach would also require that in devising economic policies not only poverty reduction as a percentage of the population is considered but also the impact of such policies on specific groups.

Eleven codes adopted by various international organisations, which ‘all African countries should strive to observe within their capacity capabilities’, are endorsed in the Governance Declaration\textsuperscript{111} These codes are:

The claim that these codes have been developed ‘through consultative processes that involved the active participation of and endorsement by African countries’ might be correct with regard to some of the instruments, but certainly not all of them. Some of these codes have been adopted by organisations in which there is no African representation, such as the OECD. It is notable that the list is almost identical to the ‘Standards and Codes Relevant for Bank and

In line with the Governance Declaration, OSCI and the Questionnaire set out five objectives under economic governance and management:

1. Promote macroeconomic policies that support sustainable development
2. Implement transparent, predictable and credible government economic policies
3. Promote sound public finance management
4. Fight corruption and money laundering
5. Accelerate regional integration by participating in the harmonization of monetary, trade and investment policies amongst the participating states

As implementation of human rights demand resources question 4 under objective 1 is particularly important: ‘What has your country done to increase domestic resource mobilisation including public and private savings and capital formation, and reduce capital flight?’\textsuperscript{124}

3.5.4 Corporate governance

OSCI and the Questionnaire treat corporate governance as a separate category from economic governance. The following objectives are set out:\textsuperscript{125}

1. Provide an enabling environment and effective regulatory framework for economic activities
2. Ensure that corporations act as good corporate citizens with regard to human rights, social responsibility and environmental sustainability \textsuperscript{123} International Monetary Fund & The World Bank The Standards and Codes Initiative – Is it effective? And how can it be improved? (2005).

\textsuperscript{124} Questionnaire 49. Cf NEPAD paras 144-145.
\textsuperscript{125} OSCI 60.
3. Promote the adoption of codes of good business ethics (eg Cadbury and King codes) in achieving the objectives of the organisation
4. Ensure that corporations treat all their stakeholders (shareholders, employees, communities, suppliers and customers) in a fair and just manner
5. Provide for accountability of corporations and directors

Human rights are explicitly discussed under objective 2. According to the introduction to the corporate governance section of the Questionnaire:

Some of the specific issues covered include employee rights, provision of safe working environment and fair wages; the degree of corporations’ responsiveness to community needs including focus on issues such as health (HIV/AIDS, Malaria, Tuberculosis (TB), Yellow Fever), education and skills development; and responsible behaviour with regard to the environment including environmental rehabilitation projects, environmental impact assessments, recycling and use of clean technology.

Three questions are set out under this objective:

1. Are there measures in place to ensure that corporations recognise and observe human [sic] and labour laws?
2. To what extent are corporations responsive to the concerns of the communities in which they operate?
3. What measures have been put in place to ensure sustainable management on the part of corporations?

The indicators under question 1 are:

Describe your country’s labour laws particularly with regard to:
- Employee’s rights including the right to unionise
- The procedures for handling and settling labour disputes

126 Questionnaire 61.
Assess the level of corporations’ compliance with labour laws and human rights provisions with reference to:

- The provision of a safe working environment and fair wages to employees
- Corporations’ handling of employee disputes, safety issues and matters relating to employee compensation for injury in the workplace
- Number of trade unions, the percentage share of the workforce belonging to a trade union, and the effectiveness of trade unions in resolving labour disputes
- Number and frequency of mass industrial and labour disputes and strikes
- Citation and prosecution of corporations for labour and human rights violations and details of sanctions imposed.

While these issues are important it must also be recognised that they tend to neglect the informal sector through which most Africans earn their living.

3.5.5 Socio-economic development

The Governance Declaration states under the heading ‘Socio-economic development’ that > poverty can only be effectively tackled through the promotion of democracy, good governance, peace and security; the development of human and physical resources; gender equality; openness to international trade and investment; allocation of appropriate funds to social sector and; new partnerships between governments and the private sector, and with civil society.\(^{127}\)

The Heads of State and Government undertake to provide ‘more and better education and training, especially in Information and Communications Technology (ICT) and other skills central to a globalising world; and better health care, with priority attention to addressing HIV/AIDS and other pandemic diseases’\(^{128}\) and to ensure gender equality.\(^{129}\)

\(^{127}\) Governance Declaration para 20.

\(^{128}\) Governance Declaration para 21.
OSCI and the Questionnaire sets out the following objectives:

1. Promote self-reliance in development and build capacity for self-sustaining development
2. Accelerate socio-economic development to achieve sustainable development and poverty eradication
3. Strengthen policies, delivery mechanisms and outcomes in key social areas including education and combating of HIV/AIDS and other communicable diseases
4. Ensuring affordable access to water, sanitation, energy, finance (including micro-finance), markets, ICT, shelter and land to all citizens, especially the rural poor
5. Progress towards gender equality in all critical areas of concern, including equal access to education for girls at all levels
6. Encourage broad-based participation in development by all stakeholders at all levels

The APRM framework documents do not include references to human rights in the governance area of socio-economic development, though some human rights standards are listed as relevant to socio-economic development. There is clearly much duplication in the reports due to the same issues being treated as human rights issues under political governance and as developmental issues under socio-economic development.

User charges for basic public services is very much an issue in many African countries in particular in the context of privatisation. Such charges can be seen as ‘regressive taxation’ disadvantaging the poor. The Questionnaire highlights the issue under objective 4 in posing the question: ‘What policies and strategies has the government put in place to ensure that all citizens, in particular the rural and urban poor, have affordable access to basic needs?\textsuperscript{131} The indicators under this question illustrate a recognition of human rights principles such as accountability and non-discrimination:

(i) Provide evidence of legal, policy, processes and institutional steps to ensure affordable access to basic needs;
(ii) Provide evidence of the resources mobilised and allocated and criteria for such allocation;
(iii) Describe the results achieved in terms of:
  • Percentage of population disaggregated by region, residence, gender, social category, etc. with affordable access to basic needs,
  • Availability and accessibility of basic services to rural and urban poor and other vulnerable groups,
  • Particular impact of the privatisation of public utilities where applicable;
(iv) Outline the challenges faced and steps to address these constraints.

3.5.6 Overlap

There is much overlap within and between the four governance areas, for example with regard to corruption which is dealt with both under political governance and economic governance. The problem of overlapping is made worse by the fact that analysts, both at the national and international level, are assigned to one specific governance area and there is thus a risk of conflicting outcomes. That this risk is not only theoretical is clear from a perusal of the country review reports which have been published so far.

3.5.7 Standards not included in the APRM framework

Among UN treaties which have not been explicitly included in the APRM framework documents are the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, the Optional Protocol to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women,\textsuperscript{132} and the Second Optional Protocol to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights aiming at the abolition of the death penalty. No mention is made of the UNESCO Convention against Discrimination in Education. With regard to instruments on international humanitarian law only Geneva Convention IV relating to protection of civilian persons in time of war is mentioned in any of the APRM documents. There is no mention of the Statute of the International Criminal Court. While many of the outcome documents of the UN World Conferences are referred to, there is no mention made of the Vienna Declaration and Programme of Action. Many of the major declarations dealing with administration of justice and protection of detained persons have also been left out.\textsuperscript{133} In addition to the instruments which have been left out, recently adopted treaties such as the Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities and the Convention for the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearance should also be considered.

With regard to African Union instruments there is no reference to the Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights on establishment of an African Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights. There is also no reference to the Convention on the Prevention and Combating of Terrorism and the Protocol thereto. The Declaration and Plan of Action for the Promotion and Protection of Human Rights adopted by the first OAU ministerial conference on human rights in Mauritius in 1999 is referred to but not the Declaration of the first AU ministerial conference on human rights in Kigali, Rwanda, in 2003. There is no reference to the many resolutions of the African Commission which provides an authoritative view on the content of the brief and often vague provisions of the Charter.

\textsuperscript{132} This protocol sets out procedures for individual complaints and inquiries.

\textsuperscript{133} These include the Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners, the Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials, the Body of Principles for the Protection of All Persons under Any Form of Detention or Imprisonment, Principles of Medical Ethics, Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, Basic Principles on the Role of Lawyers, Declaration on the Protection of All Persons from Enforced Disappearances, Principles on the Effective Prevention and Investigation of Extra-Legal, Arbitrary and Summary Executions and the Basic Principles for the Treatment of Prisoners.
3.5.8 Conflicting standards and codes

It is not clear from the APRM framework how to deal with standards and codes set out in the Governance Declaration, OSCI and the Questionnaire which conflict with each other. As will be clear from the case studies in chapters 6 to 8 the situation may not arise as actual compliance monitoring with the specific standards and codes is often lacking in the country review reports. However, should the question arise the conflicting codes and standards would have to be examined in the light of the values set out in the Governance Declaration.

3.6 Concluding remarks

The genesis of the APRM can be traced to the lack of monitoring of agreed goals. In addition to lack of commitment and resources, a lack of monitoring has been identified as having contributed to the failure of the various development plans of the past. The APRM sets out to fill this gap. However, it must be noted that the APRM is not about measuring compliance with the NEPAD Declaration which only features as one of many international instruments underlying the process.

The APRM framework is far from straightforward with its myriad of standards and codes. The picture gets even more complicated when one considers the recommendations in the country review reports or the action points in the Programme of Action which are often not clearly based on any enumerated standard or codes or on popular views. However, the focus of this chapter has been on how human rights are dealt with in the APRM framework. Actual practice will be dealt with in the case studies in part II of this study. It is clear from the overview above that human rights have been considered quite extensively in designing the APRM but that there is a lack of coherence between and within the framework documents in particularly the overly detailed Questionnaire.

To fulfil its potential it is imperative that the APRM should use a rights-based approach to development. Such an approach is goal orientated in that it seeks the realisation of everyone’s human rights and also process orientated in that it requires a ‘participatory, non-discriminatory, transparent, and accountable’ development process.¹³⁴ Such an approach is evident to some extent in the APRM framework documents in particular in the Questionnaire. As has been noted in this chapter there is however much that can be improved in the current framework.¹³⁵ The impact of the current framework on the first country review reports will be evaluated in the case studies in part II of this study.

In order for the APRM to contribute to a rights-based development process it must itself be guided by these requirements. The extent to which this is the case will be examined in the next chapter.

¹³⁵ At the time of writing the outcome of the current review process of the APRM framework documents was not known.
CHAPTER 4
STRUCTURE AND PROCESS: PARTICIPATION, ACCOUNTABILITY AND TRANSPARENCY

4.1 Introduction

This chapter first gives a brief overview of how the APRM process works. It thereafter sets out the institutions which have been established at the international and national level to implement the APRM.

The former chairperson of the APRM Forum, Chief Olusegun Obasanjo has noted that ‘[i]f the APRM is to be credible and effective, it will need to be transparent and engage all the stakeholders in each country.’\(^1\)

Participation of all concerned in devising policies and responses to governance deficiencies is essential for a rights-based approach. In analysing the APRM process this chapter thus considers to what extent effective non-discriminatory participation of all stakeholders has been ensured.

To ensure accountability structures must be in place to make sure that identified governance deficiencies are addressed. The Programme of Action (POA) forms the basis for ensuring that rhetoric is replaced by action. However, the POA is not enough in itself. There is need for vigilance from all parts of society in ensuring that it is implemented.

Transparency is essential both for effective participation and accountability and the chapter discusses to what extent the APRM has been implemented in a transparent manner in the participating countries and the extent to which the international APRM structures have helped in ensuring transparency.

4.2 The review process

The APRM Base Document sets out a five stage process.\(^2\) The first stage involves a background study by the APRM Secretariat, based in South Africa, which is conducted parallel to a self-assessment at the national level. The background study and self-assessment are based on the Questionnaire discussed in the previous chapter. A country support mission is fielded before the commencement of the self-assessment to ensure that the national structures needed to conduct the review in accordance with the guidelines are in place. The country under review prepares a preliminary Programme of Action to respond to the governance shortcoming identified in the self-assessment.

The first step for a country that will undergo a review is to establish the necessary national structures as described below. When a country considers that it has made sufficient progress in establishing these structures it requests a support mission. This mission is undertaken with the purpose to ascertain the extent of preparedness and the capacity of the country to participate in the peer review process, and particularly to undertake its self-assessment and draft its National Programme of Action. The Support Mission is also intended to create common understanding of the overall APRM processes and instruments, and to ensure that the institutional and organisational arrangements provide for active involvement and participation of major stakeholders on an ongoing basis.\(^3\)

The support missions usually last around three days. The support mission team consists of seven to nine members, including staff from the APRM Secretariat, the UN Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA), the African Development Bank (ADB) and the UN Development Programme (UNDP). The team is led by the member of the APRM Panel of Eminent Persons responsible for the review of that country. During the support mission an MOU on technical assessments and the country review visits is concluded between the APRM Panel and the country reviewed represented by the APRM National Focal Point.

The APRM Secretariat has indicated that it will send advance missions to certain countries that have signed up for the APRM but which have not reached a stage which would merit the sending of a support mission. With regard to participating states that have received a support mission, the Panel can decide to send a follow-up mission as it has done with regard to Algeria, Kenya, Nigeria, South Africa and Uganda. Such follow-up missions are necessary with regard to countries which have experienced a long delay in implementing the APRM process. At the time of writing a number of countries which have signed the MOU had still not taken any action to start the review process.

Stage two consists of the visit by the country review team after the self-assessment and the preliminary Programme of Action has been submitted to the APRM Secretariat. The country review mission is undertaken by a team which is normally led by the same Panel member that undertook the support mission. Review missions had by July 2009 been sent to Ghana (April 2005), Rwanda (April 2005), Kenya (October 2005), South Africa (July 2006), Algeria (December 2006, March 2007) and Benin (July-August 2007), Uganda

4 African Peer Review Mechanism Annual report 2006 3. An advance mission consisting of Ambassador Kiplagat and an APRM Secretariat staff member was sent to Sudan in April 2007

5 Uganda launched the self-assessment process only in February 2007, two years after the country support mission which should have kick-started the process. Nigeria received a follow-up mission in July 2007, almost two and a half years after the country support mission. Burkina Faso which had received a country support mission in June 2006 launched its self-assessment in October 2007. Mozambique held its first stakeholder conference in August 2007, a year after the country support mission. Sierra Leone started the APRM process in September 2008, more than four years after signing the MOU.

6 For details on the status of implementation of the APRM in the countries which have signed the MOU see annex.

7 However, the country review mission to Rwanda was led by Dr Njeuma and not by Ms Savané who had conducted the support mission. J Wangui ‘NEPAD team lauds Kagame’ The New Times (Kigali), 1 May 2005, allafrica.com (accessed 24 May 2005).
(February 2008), Burkina Faso (February 2008), Nigeria (February-March 2008), Mali (December 2008), Lesotho (January-February 2009) and Mozambique (February 2009).

Stage three is the preparation of the country review report following the country review mission. At the fourth stage the report is submitted for discussion among the peers in the APRM Forum of Heads of State and Government. By July 2009 the reports of the 12 countries listed above had been considered by the Forum.

The fifth stage consists of the report being publicly tabled in the Pan-African Parliament, the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights, the Peace and Security Council and ECOSOCC. This should take place six months after its consideration by the Forum.

The APRM Base Document sets out that the review process from the start of stage one until submission of the report to the Forum should not exceed six months.\(^8\) In February 2004 the Panel expressed the hope that the 16 countries that had signed up by then should be reviewed by March 2006.\(^9\) By that time only one country had completed the review process. It is thus clear that the time frames set out at the beginning of the process were overly optimistic.

4.3 Institutional structure at the international level

4.3.1 Forum of Heads of State and Government

The highest decision making body of the APRM is the Forum of Heads of State and Government of the participating states. Both the NEPAD Implementation Committee and the APRM Forum of Participating Heads of State and Government (APRM Forum) can be seen as sub-committees to the AU

\(^8\) APRM Base Document para 26.

Assembly of Heads of State and Government. The NEPAD Implementation Committee took a number of decisions with regard to the APRM, especially during the early development of the process.\(^\text{10}\) As the Forum of Heads of State and Government now meets regularly on the fringes of the bi-annual AU Assembly meetings, there is no longer a need for the NEPAD Implementation Committee to deal with the APRM. Indeed, the APRM has been delinked from NEPAD.\(^\text{11}\)

The Forum meets at least twice a year.\(^\text{12}\) President Obasanjo of Nigeria presided over the Forum from its inception until he stepped down as president of Nigeria in May 2007. He was replaced as chairperson of the NEPAD Implementation Committee and the Forum by Prime Minister Meles Zenawi of Ethiopia.\(^\text{13}\)

\(^{\text{10}}\) Decisions concerning the APRM were taken by the NEPAD Implementation Committee at its summits in October 2001, March, June and November 2002, March and May 2003, May 2004 and April 2005.

\(^{\text{12}}\) The APRM Forum held its first meeting in Kigali, Rwanda on 13 February 2004, the day before the ninth Summit of the NEPAD Implementation Committee. The second Forum was held in connection with the 12th Summit of the NEPAD Implementation Committee in Algiers on 23 November 2004. The third Forum was held in Abuja, Nigeria on 19 June 2005, announcing that the fourth APRM Forum would be held in the middle of August 2005. However, the Forum was later postponed and held in conjunction with the AU Summit in Khartoum, Sudan, in January 2006. Since then the APRM Forum has met in connection with the AU Summits: fifth Forum, Banjul, July 2006, sixth Forum, Addis Ababa, January 2007, seventh Forum, Accra, 1 July 2007, eighth Forum, Addis Ababa, January 2008, ninth Forum, Sharm el Sheik, Egypt, July 2008. An ‘extraordinary’ Forum was held in October 2008 in Cotonou, Benin. On the extraordinary Forum see www.forumextra1maep.bj/actu.php and S Gruzd ‘Peer review progress, but many miss the meeting’, South African Institute of International Affairs, 29 October 2008, www.saiia.org, (accessed 7 July 2009).

The main function of the Forum is to exercise peer pressure to persuade the state under review to initiate changes suggested in the APRM country review report.\textsuperscript{14} In addition the Forum adopts the various documents that form the APRM framework and appoints the members of the Panel.\textsuperscript{15} The Forum also approves the list of partner institutions and consultants. The Forum has also started to have general discussions about common problems facing the continent.\textsuperscript{16}

The peer review undertaken by the Forum will be discussed further below.

4.3.2 Panel of Eminent Persons

The APRM Base Document provides for the APRM to be ‘directed and managed by a Panel of between 5 and 7 Eminent Persons.’\textsuperscript{17} The Panel has an oversight function and should ensure the integrity of the process.\textsuperscript{18} The APRM Base Document makes provision for a ‘Charter’ that should set out its ‘mission and duties’ and ‘secure the independence, objectivity and integrity of the Panel’.
Such a Charter has not been adopted, but in February 2004 the Forum approved Rules of Procedure of the Panel and the Secretariat.\textsuperscript{19} The mandate of the Panel is to ‘exercise oversight of the APR process with a view to ensuring the independence, professionalism and credibility of the process.’ In particular the Panel:

\begin{itemize}
  \item Reviews and adopts the work plan and budget prepared by the Secretariat;
  \item Approve the terms of any agreements that may be necessary for the proper conduct of the APRM;
\end{itemize}

\textsuperscript{14} APRM Base Document para 24.
\textsuperscript{15} Many decisions with regard to the APRM process have however been taken by the NEPAD Implementation Committee.

\textsuperscript{17} APRM Base Document para 6.
\textsuperscript{18} APRM Base Document para 10
\textsuperscript{19} The Rules and Procedures of the APR Panel and the APR Secretariat NEPAD/APR
- Approve plans for missions and the composition of the review teams;
- Examine the country review reports and make recommendations to the APR Forum;
- Present an annual report to the APR Forum on the implementation of the APRM;
- Initiate seminars and consultations;
- Review the APRM ‘from time to time’ and make recommendations to the Forum.

The Panel should meet at least four times a year, normally at the Secretariat in South Africa. The Panel has issued communiqués after some of its meetings, but not on a regular basis. Relevant material should be distributed to the members at least ten days prior to the meeting. Five members constitute quorum for a meeting of the Panel. Decisions are taken by a majority of the votes cast. The Executive Director of the APRM Secretariat acts as Secretary of the Panel.

Candidates to the Panel should be nominated by participating countries. However, only two of the initial panel members came from countries that had signed up for the APRM at the time of their appointment. At the sixth summit of the NEPAD Implementation Committee in March 2003 the chairperson of the Committee, President Obasanjo, was mandated to discuss with each African region who should be appointed to the Panel. At the following NEPAD summit in May 2003 six persons were appointed as members of the panel: Adebayo Adedeji (Nigeria) and Marie-Angelique Savané (Senegal) for west Africa, Bethuel Kiplagat (Kenya) for east Africa, Dorothy Njeuma (Cameroon) for central Africa and Graca Machel (Mozambique) and Chris Stals (South Africa) for southern Africa. At the third meeting of the Panel in November 2003, President Obasanjo noted the appointment of Mourad Medelci (Algeria) as the seventh member of the Panel. The APRM Forum, meeting in February 2004, confirmed the appointment effective from 27 July 2003. When Mr Medelci became a minister in May 2005, the Algerian president Bouteflika was given the choice of who to replace him with. Mr Medelci’s compatriot Mohammed Seghir Babes became the new representative of the northern region.\textsuperscript{25}

The APRM Forum appoints the chairperson of the Panel. At the third meeting of the Panel in Abuja in November 2003, President Obasanjo appointed Ms Savané as chairperson. Mr Kiplagat became chairperson in June 2005, replaced by Dr Njeuma in 2006. Professor Adedeji was appointed chairperson by the Forum in July 2007.\textsuperscript{26}

The initial term of appointment for Panel members is four years.\textsuperscript{27} As the terms thus expired in May 2007, the Forum extended the terms of all the Panel members for one year at the Forum in July 2007.\textsuperscript{28} Panel members may offer themselves for reappointment. It was decided that three new members should be elected at the Forum in July 2008 and four new members at the Forum in \textsuperscript{25} Press release following the 13th meeting of the African Peer Review Mechanism Panel of Eminent Persons.

January 2009. However, by July 2009 only one new member had been elected to the Panel, Ms Domitille Mukantaganzwa from Rwanda. Dr Stals and Ms Savané have retired from the Panel. There are plans to expand the number of Panel members.

In appointing the members of the Panel the Forum should ensure that the candidates are Africans ‘of high moral stature and demonstrated commitment to the ideals of Pan Africanism.’ They should ‘have distinguished themselves in careers that are considered relevant to the work of the APRM’. The Panel should have ‘expertise in the areas of political governance, macro-economic management, public financial management and corporate governance.’ Regional balance, gender equity and cultural diversity should also be considered in appointing the members of the Panel.

Some of the members of the Panel have been criticised for being too close to government. However, the first reviews indicate that they have undertaken their work in an independent and impartial manner without any political interference. A more fitting critique is with regard to the system of appointment of the members of the Panel. The APRM Forum in January 2009 ‘mandated the Panel to come up with transparent procedures for appointing members of the Panel as well as modalities of designating the Chairperson at the next meeting of the APR Forum.’ A welcome development would be if the Forum started to appoint the members of the Panel in a transparent manner which would include civil society consultations.

4.3.3 Secretariat

To support the Panel the APRM Base Document provides for the establishment of a ‘competent’ Secretariat.

The functions of the Secretariat include

- maintaining extensive database information on political and economic developments in all participating countries, preparation of background documents for the Peer Review Teams, proposing performance indicators and tracking performance of individual countries.\(^{36}\)

The mandate of the Secretariat is further elaborated in the ‘Rules and Procedures of the APR Panel and the APR Secretariat’ and include to:

- Organise the country review visits;
- Liaise with other international organisations;
- Liaise with interested external partners and supporting participating countries in raising money for the APRM process;
- Facilitate technical assistance;
- Organise workshops and regional networks.

The MOU provides that the NEPAD Secretariat shall act as APRM Secretariat until the latter has been established. The decision to place the APRM Secretariat under NEPAD reversed an earlier decision by the NEPAD Implementation Committee that the Secretariat should be located in UNECA.\(^{37}\)

\(^{36}\) APRM Base Document para 12.

A separate APRM Secretariat was later established but both the NEPAD Secretariat and the APRM Secretariat were housed in the headquarters of the Development Bank of Southern Africa (DBSA) in Midrand, South Africa.

The African Union concluded host agreements with the government of South Africa for the APRM and NEPAD Secretariats in October 2008. Before this the DBSA contracted staff and consultants for the APRM and NEPAD and administered funds. This is despite the fact that the Rules and Procedures of the APR Panel and the APR Secretariat provided that the Executive Director of the APRM Secretariat should be the legal representative of the APRM. Through the host agreement the South African government provides the APRM Secretariat with legal status as 'an AU office operating outside the headquarters of the AU'. The Chairperson of the Panel of Eminent Persons or his or her representative is given the power to conclude contracts, acquiring and disposing of property and receiving and instituting legal proceedings.

The Executive Director is appointed by the Panel for a three-year term, renewable once.\textsuperscript{43} In October 2003 Dr Kerfalla Yansane, a Guinean economist, was appointed by the Panel to lead the Secretariat for six months while an Executive Director was recruited.\textsuperscript{44} In 2005 Dr Bernard Kouassi was appointed as Executive Director of the Secretariat.\textsuperscript{45} In July 2008 the Forum decided not to renew the contract of Dr Kouassi.\textsuperscript{46} Staff of the APRM Secretariat must be nationals of an African country, but not necessarily one that has acceded to the APRM. According to a former member of the Panel, the Secretariat suffers from lack of research capacity and much of the time of its staff is devoted to administrative tasks and the planning of review missions.\textsuperscript{47}

According to the Rules and Procedures, members of the Panel, the Executive Director and Secretariat staff shall ‘be granted in the territory of Participating Countries such rights, immunities and privileges as may be necessary for the independent exercise of their functions, in accordance with the General Convention on the Privileges and Immunities of the Organization of African Unity and the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 1961.’\textsuperscript{48} Immunities are further provided for in the host agreement.

Panel to work out modalities for establishing relations with other institutions on the continent that may be able to assist and facilitate its work.\textsuperscript{49} The functions of the partner institutions include the following:\textsuperscript{50}

- Advice the Panel and Secretariat;
- Sharing information and experiences;
- Advising participating countries.

The list of partner institutions is divided between strategic partners and regional and international resource institutions. The strategic partners are the organs/units of the African Union. Specifically mentioned are the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights,\textsuperscript{51} the African Committee on the Rights and Welfare of the Child, the Peace and Security Council, the Pan-African Parliament and the CSSDCA unit of the AU Commission.\textsuperscript{52} It also makes provision for including '[a]ny other organ, committee or unit of the AU as they are established or operationalised such as the election monitoring committee and the Court of Justice.' ECOSOCC is not included on the list, but as the voice of civil society in the AU it could play a role in the process. The AU organs have not actively participated in the APRM process with the exception of the presentation of the country review reports to the Pan-African Parliament discussed further below.

However, in the interim Rules of Procedure circulated for comments in January 2009 there is no specific reference to the APRM. Rule 126(1) provides that: 'The Commission, in fulfilling its mandate, shall establish formal relations of cooperation, including meetings as necessary, with all African Union organs, institutions and programmes that have a human rights element in their mandate.'

\textsuperscript{52} The CSSDCA unit has been renamed the African Citizens' Directorate to better reflect its current mandate of facilitating civil society engagement with AU organs.
The strategic partners further include the African Development Bank (ADB), the United Nations Economic Commission for Africa (UNECA) and the Africa Bureau of the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP). These three institutions have actively participated in the process, at their own cost, for example through staff members participating in the country review visits.53

Regional resource institutions include the regional economic communities (RECs), the Association of African Central Banks, the Centre for Corporate Governance and private sector associations linked to the RECs, the African Academy of Sciences and the African Capacity Building Foundation.

International resource institutions include the UN and its agencies, the OECD, the EU Commission, the Commonwealth, the Francophonie, the Arab League, the South Centre, the IMF, the World Bank, the Bank for International Settlements and the International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance (IDEA).

The APRM Secretariat has relied heavily on consultants for the country review teams. Some of these consultants have been associated with regional resource institutions. The process for selection of consultants is unclear apart from that they should be Africans, though they may live in other parts of the world. It is clear that the length of the country review missions (which can last up to a month as discussed further below) have an impact on the pool of available consultants.

4.4 The national structures and process: Ensuring participation and credibility

4.4.1 The meaning of participation

The MOU provides that participation of ‘all stakeholders ... including trade unions, women, youth, civil society, private sector, rural communities and professional associations’ in the development of the Programme of Action should be ensured.\textsuperscript{54}

A stakeholder is someone who has ‘an interest or share in an undertaking or enterprise’.\textsuperscript{55} Since the objective of the APRM is to improve the performance of the participating states in the four governance areas it follows that all residents of a state are stakeholders in this ‘undertaking’. This definition of stakeholder also corresponds to the examples given in the MOU as set out above. Participation of stakeholders should not be equated with civil society participation. For example parliaments can play an important role in the APRM process.\textsuperscript{56}

Participation must include collecting and seriously considering the views on the issues to be addressed and possible solutions of a cross section of society with a view of building a national consensus. As many of the issues are complex the process requires public education, but an education campaign should not be aimed at imposing certain views on the populace. The ‘core guiding principles’ of the review must be kept in mind, namely that the review must be ‘technically competent, credible and free of political manipulation’.\textsuperscript{57}

Democracy is clearly absent from a number of the states that have signed up for the APRM. It seems unlikely that these states would engage their citizens in a genuine consultative process when they are denied the right to participate in government through free and fair elections. Rep 58 resentative democracy is about giving a limited number of citizens the mandate to decide which policy should be pursued by the state and regularly submit the performance of these representatives to be judged by the populace in elections. But democracy does not end with regular elections.

Democracy requires the protection of human rights which includes the ‘right [of the citizen] to participate freely in the government of his country.’ This requires that the representatives of the people, whether part of the legislative or executive branch of government and whether at the national or local level, should conduct their business in a transparent manner and be open to suggestions from everyone. Participation also requires empowerment of the poor which in addition to education requires ‘the realization of a minimum degree of economic security without which the poor are unlikely to be able to resist established structures that perpetuate their poverty.’ It is thus clear that effective participation require a minimum respect for both civil and political and socio-economic rights.

The APRM provides a framework for anyone interested in any of the issues covered to engage the representatives of the state on the policy adopted by the state. There are certain limitations to this engagement inherent in the APRM framework in addition to the limitations to effective participation set out above. Firstly, to obtain the views of everybody on all the issues raised by the APRM would be impossible. Secondly, there are many issues on which the ordinary 58 However, it could also be argued that the APRM open up space for dialogue which will 'be difficult to reverse'. E Kannyo 'Liberalization, democratization and political leadership in Africa' in JC Senghor and NK Poku Towards Africa's renewal (2007) 78.

59 African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights art 13(1).

citizen would not have an opinion, either because a lack of interest or because a lack of knowledge of the particular topic.

The easiest way to ensure participation is to engage civil society organisations. However, it has been argued that in most of Africa there is ‘no self-standing civil society because vertical ties remain more significant than horizontal (professional or functional) links.’\(^{61}\) Thus, it is essential to consider how representative civil society organisations are of those they claim to represent. Thirdly, the mandate of the APRM is to encourage compliance with ‘agreed political, economic and corporate governance values, codes and standards’.\(^{62}\) Ostensibly only views that agree with what is set out in these standards will be considered. This is despite that many of these standards were not adopted through participatory process. The APRM POA should be aligned to existing plans which often were adopted without any genuine participation.

The emphasis on participation is nothing new. For example participation is central to the process leading to the adoption of Poverty Reduction Strategy Papers (PRSPs).\(^{63}\) PRSPs should be developed through consultations with a cross section of society. However, participation of local communities in the PRSP process has mostly been formal. Questions have been frowned upon and ‘[o]wnership’ is created through witnessing an inaudible rendition of problems, and an illegible rendering of solutions.’\(^{64}\) Some have argued that the participatory approach of the PRSPs have focused on getting support for neo-liberal economic policies, as pursued by the IMF and the World Bank.\(^{65}\) Indeed ‘[a] closer examination of the macroeconomic and structural reform policy

contents of the 30 completed PRSPs reveals that there is no fundamental departure from the kind of policy advice provided under earlier structural adjustment programmes.\footnote{F Stewart & M Wang ‘Poverty reduction strategy papers within the human rights perspective’ in P Alston & M Robinson (eds) Human rights and development – Towards mutual reinforcement (2005) 466.} In practice ‘participation’ has seldom had any real influence:\footnote{Cornwall & Brock (2005) 1052.}

In PRSP implementation the consultative processes designed to create social ownership have conceptualised participation narrowly, and often run on timetables that disregard the rhythm of the domestic policy process. They have usually offered limited spaces for engagement to invited CSOs, whose views beyond the consensus, if they are expressed at all, seldom find their way into final documents.

To what extent does the APRM process invite more genuine participation than has been the case with the development of PRSPs? Initiatives to ensure participation in the APRM have included inviting comments from individuals, civil society organisations, elite and household surveys and validation workshops. The use of these various methods will be discussed below. The country review missions potentially play an important role in monitoring that the views of stakeholders are reflected in the self-assessment.

\subsection*{4.4.2 Raising awareness}

To receive useful input the APRM coordinating structures must embark on public education about the APRM. Knowledge about the purpose of the APRM is particularly needed when the review process takes place at the same time as political campaigning. This was for example the case with the self-assessment of South Africa which coincided with elections to local government. However, it might be advisable to avoid scheduling the APRM review at times of elections as a government might not want to open itself up to a process that is bound to provide political opponents with ample arguments about the government’s shortcomings.

Knowledge about the process is obviously important to ensure that everyone interested make their voices heard. It is important to invite everyone interested to participate in meetings or make written submissions and ensure that the diversity of views is reflected in the final report. Advertisements can be placed in various media taking note of the wider use of broadcast than print media in Africa. Media should also be encouraged to discuss the APRM. However, cost and benefit of awareness raising initiatives must be evaluated. For example the creation of an APRM song in South Africa arguably did not contribute much to the process.

4.4.3 National focal points

At its first meeting in February 2004 the APRM Forum endorsed the recommendation that a Focal Point be established in each participating country. The APRM National Focal Point should be at Ministerial level or a High-Level Official reporting directly to the Head of State or Government and with access to all national stakeholders. The contact details of all APRM National Focal Points should be forwarded to the NEPAD Secretariat/APR Secretariat as soon as identified.

Participating countries have taken different approaches as to who to appoint as national focal point. Some countries have appointed a person, while others an institution. In the latter case it seems clear that the head of the institution or government department is the person assigned as focal point. The powers of the national focal point stretches from South Africa where the national focal point was fully in control of the whole review process to Benin where the national focal point ‘was directed not to intervene at all in the process itself so as not to influence or distort the results.’

4.4.4 National coordinating structures

At its meeting in February 2004 the APRM Forum approved a recommendation by the Panel that ‘participating countries immediately take steps to identify or establish broad-based and all-inclusive APRM National Coordinating Structures where they do not already exist.’ The participating countries have given these structures different names: Governing Council (Ghana, Kenya, South Africa), National Commission (Algeria, Benin, Mali, Rwanda and Uganda), National Council (Burkina Faso) and National Working Group and Steering Committee (Nigeria). Their role is to ensure that the self-assessment and Programme of Action is developed according to the ‘core guiding principles’ of the APRM which means that the reviews must be ‘technically competent, credible and free of political manipulation.’

To place the national coordinating structure outside the control of government is meant to ensure the credibility and independence of the process. However, not all countries agree and some such as Rwanda and South Africa have put the process firmly in the hands of government. The Panel has insisted that civil society organisations should be well represented and many of the participating states have also included representatives of the private sector, national monitoring institutions, parliaments etc. The post of chairperson is often given to someone representing civil society. A lack of transparency in selecting the members of the national coordinating structure has been raised with regard to many of the participating countries.

The different approaches to the independence of the APRM coordinating structure for government was discussed at the Sixth Africa Governance Forum in May 2006:

On the one hand, there was a strong argument for internalising the APRM process within the government system as a way of securing its legitimacy and access to public resources. On the other hand, some countries argued for the exact opposite: the independence of the governing Councils so as to secure freedom to effectively undertake the APRM reviews. This issue provoked considerable level of debate/reflection during the plenary sessions as well as during the Heads of State segment. It was generally concluded that ‘absolute independence’ from the governments was neither feasible nor desirable while there is value in ensuring that APRM structures at the country level retain significant professional leverage and freedom of action to manage the process without undue state influence that could compromise professional judgment.

The size and composition of the coordinating structures vary from country to country. Membership of the national coordinating structures ranges from seven members in Ghana’s Governing Council to 250 members of Nigeria’s National Working Group as reconstituted by President Yar’Adua in November 2007. The Panel has noted that if ‘the Commission is too small, it may bring 77 According to the decree establishing the Benin Commission the chair and one of the vice-chairs must come from civil society while the other vice-chair should be held by a member of parliament, Badet (2008) 7.

79 The initial arrangement in Nigeria was a 49-member National Working Group with a 14-member National Steering Committee. The current National Steering Committee has 42 members, see Jinadu (2008).
perceptions of non-inclusivity; if too large, it may make decision-making cumbersome.\textsuperscript{80}

Some national coordinating structures, such as Ghana, have been given the task of producing the follow up reports on implementation of the POA. Others, such as Kenya, have been dissolved following the conclusion of the review.

The extent to which civil society has been able to participate effectively through the national coordinating structures varies. South African civil society representatives on the Governing Council have complained that they were not paid and therefore had limited time to devote to the process.\textsuperscript{81} On the other hand in Kenya where members of the Governing Council were given allowances to attend meetings, there were initially many meetings which generated meagre results.\textsuperscript{82}

4.4.5 Self-assessment and Programme of Action

Most countries have opted for letting different research institutes prepare draft reports on the four thematic areas which are then integrated into one report.\textsuperscript{83} The selection of these institutions should be transparent and everyone interested should be invited to present written submissions. The process of producing the self-assessment usually starts with desk research. In conducting this research it can be useful to divide the four governance areas in smaller clusters.\textsuperscript{84} Cooperation between those involved in preparing reports is essential.

\textsuperscript{81} South African Institute of International Affairs (2006) 6. The same concern has been noted with regard to Benin, Badet (2008) 19.

\textsuperscript{83} Rwanda and Mauritius have not used the model with technical research institutions while other participating countries have not yet selected these institutions.

\textsuperscript{84} Herbert & Gruzd (2008) 54.
Many institutions, both national and international, conduct governance research and it is important to ensure consistency with such initiatives. Researchers involved in drafting the reports should therefore aim at extracting key issues and recommendations from the vast number of reports, reviews, surveys etc which exist with regard to most of the issues covered in the Questionnaire. This desk research can then be used to initiate public debate and for consultations with experts and government officials. The research institutes finally must consolidate the input received from various stakeholders into a report. The four reports are then consolidated into the self-assessment.

The self-assessment should reflect the different views put forward during the review process, while the POA by necessity must be a consensus document. The need to align the POA with other already existing plans to some extent constrains the degree of innovation possible.

Many of the same problems which have been identified with regard to stakeholder participation in other development initiatives, such as lack of awareness, limited time frames and disregard of input given, applies equally in the APRM process. Herbert and Gruzd have noted that in developing the APRM self-assessment ‘public meetings are usually inefficient means of gathering information or finding solutions to problems.’ Instead they find that surveys, and focus-group discussions and workshops focusing on specific issues have been more useful. It is clear that adequate time must be given to make effective use of such forms of consultations, and perhaps even more importantly to come up with a synthesis of existing reports, surveys, reviews etc. There is no need to reinvent the wheel.

88 Herbert & Gruzd (2008) 143.
Herbert and Gruzd argues that while there has been much focus on public consultation less attention has been given to the equally important task of securing buy-in from political leaders for suggested reforms.\(^89\) More attention should also be given to the development of the POA as the most important implementation tool of the APRM.\(^90\)

4.5 Accountability

4.5.1 Monitoring by the Panel and the country review mission

Before the country review mission the APRM Secretariat together with consultants prepare issues papers on the four governance areas. These are used to inform the country review team in their interactions with the various national stakeholders and help ensure that important issues are not overlooked in the review process.

Apart from the Panel member responsible for the country review the country review mission consists of APRM staff members, partner institutions and consultants. It has been argued that the length of the country review missions are ‘clearly not enough’ and that consultations ‘are restricted to the programme set by the host’.\(^91\) With regard to the first issue it is noticeable that the length of the missions has increased. The Ghana and Rwanda missions in 2004 only lasted 13 days. In contrast the missions to Uganda lasted 22 days and the mission to Burkina Faso 23 days. The Nigerian mission lasted 29 days and the mission was divided into two teams covering different parts of the country.

After the review mission the mission members have a short period of time to write the report on the issues they have covered. The report is edited by the

\(^90\) Herbert & Gruzd (2008) 148,
APRM Secretariat and presented to the APRM Panel. After it has been adopted by the Panel the report is sent to the government of the country under review for its comments. Lack of consultation by government at this stage of the process, which includes the submission of the final POA which should reflect the comments in the country review report, seems to be the norm rather than the exception in the reviews that have so far been conducted. Clear factual errors in the review report can be corrected by the Panel, but no other amendments can be made to the Panel’s report. The report, with the comments from the government and the final Programme of Action as amended in light of the recommendations in the country review report attached, is then presented to the APRM Forum for its consideration.

4.5.2 The status of the country review report and the Programme of Action

Aggad has illustrated how the first states to undergo the review in their POAs fail to take on board many of the recommendation made by the Panel in the country review reports. However, a state is under no legal obligation to follow the recommendations of the Panel. A legal obligation could possibly arise through the sanctions procedure available to the Forum. A best practice would be for the government to provide clear reasons as to why a certain recommendation is not transformed into an action point in the POA.

Peer pressure and in particular public pressure are likely to be the most effective means of enforcement of both the recommendations in the country review report and the POA. The implementation reports play an important role in this regard. Financial support from donors could also play a role. The effectiveness of the APRM process in bringing about change will be further explored in chapter 5.

4.5.3 The Forum discussion

The APRM Base Document provides that the fourth stage of the APRM process ends with the ‘consideration and adoption of the final report by the participating Heads of State and Government, including their decision in this regard …’.95 More details on the role of the Forum are provided in the Organisation and Processes document. The Forum has the ‘ultimate responsibility’ for ‘mutual learning and capacity building, and for exercising the constructive peer dialogue and persuasion required to make the APRM effective, credible and acceptable.’96 The Forum should ‘[c]onsider, adopt and take ownership of the country review reports submitted by the APR Panel’.97 It should ‘[e]xercise constructive peer dialogue and persuasion (through offering assistance or applying appropriate measures) to effect changes in country practice where recommended’.98 The experience of the first reviews is that the Forum has engaged the reviewed country’s head of state in some dialogue but there has not been much persuasion.

There has been much doubt expressed as to whether African leaders will be prepared to criticise each other. The ‘politics of solidarity’ is still strong in Africa.99 It is however not possible to judge the whole process on what takes place in a few hours after a process extending for several months, even years.

98 As above.
The reports on Ghana and Rwanda were presented to the third Forum in June 2005 by the respective team leaders, Dr Stals and Dr Njeuma. The participating leaders decided that they should have time to study the reports before the actual peer review took place. In January 2006 the country review report on Ghana and the accompanying Programme of Action were discussed by President Kufuor and the other heads of state at the Forum in Khartoum. The discussion lasted for four hours but according to one observer there was little discussion of best practices in Ghana; some heads of state seemed not to grasp the ethos of the peer review and spent time castigating Ghana for following (and the APR panel for supposedly endorsing) Western-inspired neo-liberal policies; Ghana’s report was so candid that there was little for the peers to add; and there was no press briefing arranged for Kufuor and little media interest generated.100

Rwanda was also scheduled to be reviewed by the Forum in Khartoum in January 2006. However, only Ghana was reviewed as President Kagame of Rwanda had sent his Prime Minister to represent him at the meeting. The Forum held that the review could only take place in the presence of the President.101 Rwanda was finally reviewed in July 2006. After Dr Njeuma and President Kagame made their presentations with regard to the Rwanda review, President Obasanjo of Nigeria and chair of the Forum noted that ‘the areas of divergence do not seem very serious.’102 This was despite the critical comments in the report on, for example, political diversity, discussed further below. Only one other member of the Forum commented: The President of Mozambique noted that he was impressed that corruption was not a big issue in Rwanda.

After the country review report on Kenya was presented at the Forum in Banjul, The Gambia, in June 2006, the Prime Minister of Ethiopia, Meles Zenawi, urged that the presentations of the reports and the responses of the reviewed state should be brief ‘to allow more time for discussions’. However President Mbeki of South Africa responded that a more thorough presentation gave those who had not read the report beforehand a chance to follow the discussions. The Communiqué issued after the Forum in Accra in July 2007, at which the reports of Algeria and South Africa were discussed, shows that the discussion of the reports was not very substantial. President Mbeki attacked what he saw as the unfair presentation of crime and xenophobia in the country.

On the one hand it is positive that heads of state are involved to a high degree in the process. On the other hand it creates problems such as slowing down the process. Expertise in the various sub-fields is also often greater among the ministers dealing with a specific issue than with the head of state.

Though the Forum is meant to consist of the heads of state or government, representation at the highest level has often been lacking. At the first Forum in February 2004, 14 of the 18 countries that had by then signed up for the APRM were represented. Only nine of these were represented by their President or Prime Minister. 15 states were represented at the third Forum in June 2005,

The Presidents of Algeria, Angola, Benin, Cameroon, Congo, Egypt, Gabon, Kenya, Mali, Mauritius, Rwanda, Senegal, Sierra Leone, South Africa, Tanzania and Uganda sent representatives.\textsuperscript{109} Participation had improved at the 7th Forum in July 2007 where 18 of 25 participants were Presidents or Prime Ministers who were ordinary members of the Assembly. Angola, Cameroon, Congo, Egypt, Mali, Mauritius and Sudan send representatives while Sao Tomé and Principe and Sierra Leone were not represented at the Forum.\textsuperscript{110} At the ‘extra-ordinary’ Forum in October 2008 only Benin, Burkina Faso, Ethiopia, South Africa and Togo were represented at the highest level. Not even the president of Nigeria turned up even though the review of the report on his country was concluded at the meeting.\textsuperscript{111}

Hansungule has argued that ‘[i]n order for the peer review to be effective, the APR Forum should hold its meetings in the home country of the state under review.’\textsuperscript{112} Leaving aside the issue whether such a practice would actually make the review more efficient, it is questionable whether a large number of heads of state and government would turn up to reviews in say five different countries each year. It would also not help transparency to have the Forum in the country under review if the current practice of private Forum meetings were retained.

4.5.4 Implementation

The Forum has a role to play also after its consideration of a country review report. The Organisation and Processes document provides that the Forum is responsible for the transmission of the reports to AU structures and, through the Secretariat, of the publication of the reports. The Forum also has the mandate to ‘[p]ersuade development partners to support the recommendations approved by the APR Forum by providing technical and financial assistance’. The ‘recommendations approved’ is presumably the POA. There is however no indication that the Forum has played this role.

According to the APRM Base Document periodic reviews should be held every two to four years. The slow pace of the reviews means that it is likely that periodic reviews including country review missions will be held more infrequently.

Participating countries are obliged to submit implementation reports to the Panel every six months and annually to the Forum. The Forum has noted that the progress reports are ‘as important as the Country Review Reports’. However, lack of time at the Forum meetings has meant that consideration of implementation reports has been delayed. For example none of the progress reports submitted to the Forum in Egypt in July 2008 could be considered then and were again deferred at the extra-ordinary summit in Benin in October 2008. The progress reports of Ghana, Rwanda, Kenya, Algeria, South Africa and Benin were finally discussed at the summit in January 2009. This delay of consideration of implementation reports further illustrates the problem of putting the process in the hands of the Forum.

In both Ghana and Rwanda the responsibility of monitoring remains with the national coordinating structure, while in Kenya the National Commission was abolished upon completion of the review. Kenyan reporting is coordinated by the NEPAD Kenya Secretariat.\(^{119}\) It is important to ensure participation in the monitoring of implementation and it would in general be preferable to retain the structures already put in place for ensuring such participation. Ghana has established APRM oversight committees at the district level to ensure the implementation of the POA.\(^{120}\)

Evaluations of the implementation of the POA should consider how it has been transferred into the budget and used. Non-utilisation of resources budgeted for the fulfilment of human rights could constitute a breach of the state’s obligation.\(^{121}\)

The Chairperson of the APRM National Governing Council of Ghana has noted that the recommendations emanating from the APRM process would be meaningless unless integrated into other development strategies.\(^{122}\) Thus, the Ghana country review report and POA influenced the development of the Growth and Poverty Reduction Strategy (GPRS II).\(^{123}\) Similarly the Rwandan POA is being integrated into the Rwandan Economic Growth and Poverty Reduction Strategy (EDPRS).\textsuperscript{124} Uganda is in the process of integrating its POA with the National Development Plan and the Medium Term Expenditure Framework.\textsuperscript{125} The precedence given to the PRSP is problematic considering the dominance of the international financial institutions over this process.

Specific issues with regard to implementation will be discussed in the case studies on Ghana, Rwanda and Kenya in chapters 6-8.

4.6 Transparency

The Panel members may not disclose ‘confidential information related to their deliberations, the country reviews, or the Participating Countries in general.’\textsuperscript{126} Seemingly there is a presumption of secrecy in the process which corresponds to the general preference for secrecy among international organisations.\textsuperscript{127} It is unclear what the reason for this confidentiality is as the process also aims at being inclusive.

Stakeholders should be able to consider various drafts and also be privy to the self-assessment report and draft POA as submitted to the APRM Secretariat in South Africa. On the contrary the final self-assessment report has been kept secret in almost all countries which have so far undergone the review.\textsuperscript{128} This situation obviously makes much more difficult the task of the country review team to verify that the self-assessment report represents the different views expressed and that the POA is a genuine consensus document.

The country review report should be 'jointly published by the APRM Commission of the country concerned and the APR Panel in accordance with laid down procedures and regulations.'\(^{129}\) The participants of the 6th African Governance Forum in May 2006 recommended that the ‘Peer Review reports should be released simultaneously to the public and to the APRM Heads of State and Government so as to minimize negative speculations and to satisfy the ownership criteria’.\(^{130}\) In practice the country review reports are published in English and French by the APRM Secretariat a few months after it has been presented to the Forum. Minutes from the Forum meeting are included as an annex to the printed reports. The reports are also made available on the APRM web site. The delay in publication of the reports makes monitoring of the implementation of the POA difficult as it is only published as part of the Country Review Report.

According to the APRM Base Document the country review report is to be publicly tabled in ‘key regional and sub-regional structures’ such as the Pan-African Parliament, the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights, the Peace and Security Council and the Economic, Social and Cultural Council (ECOSOCC). This should take place ‘[s]ix months after the report has been considered’ by the Forum.\(^{131}\) As noted above it is the Forum which is responsible to transmit the reports ‘in a timely manner’. However, in praxis this is left to the Secretariat which had by July 2009 only tabled five reports in the Pan-African Parliament.\(^{132}\)

A revision of the APRM framework documents, including the Questionnaire, was initiated by the Panel in September 2007. The process has not been transparent and has generated little response from civil society.

4.7 Concluding remarks

This chapter has explored the extent to which the APRM process is itself participatory, non-discriminatory, transparent and accountable. This is required for the process to be seen as legitimate. Through its insistence on a participatory process the APRM has the potential of deepening democracy. The process becomes an opportunity to engage on policy and resource allocations in a situation where elections are often determined by other factors. As has been shown above many challenges remain before the APRM will fulfil this potential.

Many of the countries which have gone through the process so far have in various ways made genuine effective stakeholder participation difficult. In reviewing the APRM process it is important that the APRM Panel and Forum draws up clear guidelines for effective participation. The lack of participation in the process is an often heard criticism of the APRM. However, it is not only up

This follows from the APRM Base Document para 28 which provides that the APRM should be reviewed every five years ‘[t]o enhance its dynamism’. Dr Chris Stals, one of the Panel members, told the author in May 2008 that a meeting in Algiers on revision of the APRM framework documents had been disappointing and that he did not foresee any major revision in the near future. The process was at the time of writing still on-going. In July 2009 advertisements to recruit consultants for review of the APRM framework were published by DBSA and UNDP.
to government to ensure civil society participation. Indeed, ‘civil society has not mobilised to exploit the opening that peer review offers’. Participation, transparency and accountability are important as human rights in and of themselves. However, participation in the sense that a majority view would always prevail could come in conflict with other human rights. A human rights based approach requires the building of a consensus which would consider the human rights implications of all policy prescriptions.

The extent to which the APRM process is in a good position to influence states to improve their compliance with human rights will be explored from a theoretical perspective in the next chapter and further explored in the case studies in part II of this study.

CHAPTER 5
INDUCING COMPLIANCE WITH HUMAN RIGHTS

5.1 Introduction

Many different international institutions monitor compliance with standards included in the APRM documents. Such monitoring of African countries exists among others with regard to peace and security, elections, human rights, economic policy, anti-corruption measures, money laundering, labour rights, protection of the environment, trade policy and human development. In addition to international institutions, the governance performance of a state is

2 Eg AU Peace and Security Council, UN Security Council (including sanction committees and the counter-terrorism committee).

3 The AU and sub-regional organisations often sends electoral observation missions to member countries. In addition overseas countries and organisations such as the EU often send missions to African elections.

monitored by its own institutions and civil society, by other states and by international NGOs.\textsuperscript{12}

This chapter first describes how the APRM fits into the wider international human rights system as applicable to Africa. The chapter explores why states sign up to the APRM process. It further assesses the potential effectiveness of APRM reviews in promoting compliance with APRM standards and objectives in light of compliance theories and the experience of different methods of monitoring compliance with international norms.

5.2 The international human rights regime

5.2.1 Global institutions with a mandate to promote and protect human rights in Africa

The UN human rights system is composed of the treaty based and the charter based system.\textsuperscript{13} The treaty based system is made up of treaty bodies established under six of the seven ‘core’ human rights treaties: The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD), the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (CAT), the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC) and the International Convention on the Protection of the Rights of All Migrant Workers and Members of their Families (CMW). The Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights was established by the UN Economic and Social Council \textsuperscript{12} On governance assessments by international organisations and individual donor countries see University of Essex & UNDP \textit{Preliminary survey on donor use of governance assessments} (2007).

(ECOSOC) which is mandated by the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR) to monitor the implementation of the Covenant.

The Charter based system is made up of the principal organs of the UN: The General Assembly, the Security Council, the Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC), the International Court of Justice and the Secretariat. A number of functional commissions composed of government representatives have been established under ECOSOC. The most important from a human rights perspective are the Commission on Human Rights and the Commission on the Status of Women. In 2006 the Commission on Human Rights was abolished and replaced by the Human Rights Council which was made a subsidiary body to the General Assembly.

The Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR) offers secretarial support to both the charter based and the treaty based system. A number of other UN bodies, such as the High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR), the United Nations Children’s Fund (UNICEF) and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) play an important role with regard to human rights as do specialised agencies such as the International Labour Organisation (ILO). In establishing its Inspection Panel the World Bank took an important step to ensure the protection of human rights of those affected by projects funded by the Bank.

5.2.2 The African regional human rights system

The African Union (AU) replaced the Organisation of African Unity (OAU) in 2002. The main focus of the OAU had been on achieving decolonisation and the end of minority rule and racial segregation in Southern Africa. Human rights within the member states did not feature prominently, but despite this the OAU adopted the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights (African Charter) in 1981.\textsuperscript{15}

The main institution in the African human rights system is the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights established in 1987 after the entry into force of the African Charter. All African states except Morocco are parties to the African Charter.\textsuperscript{16} An African Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights has been established in line with a Protocol to the African Charter adopted in 1998 which entered into force in 2004.\textsuperscript{17} The judges were elected in 2006, but the Court is yet to hear its first case.\textsuperscript{18} A Protocol to the African Charter on the Rights of Women was adopted in 2003 and entered into force in 2005.\textsuperscript{19} The African Commission and Court are responsible for monitoring implementation of this Protocol. The African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child, which entered into force in 1999, provides for the establishment of a Committee on the Rights and Welfare of the Child to monitor its implementation.

The AU main organs also increasingly play a role in monitoring human rights. These include the Assembly of Heads of State and Government, the Executive Council, the Pan-African Parliament (PAP), the Economic, Social and Cultural Council (ECOSOCC), the Peace and Security Council (PSC) and the AU Commission. Of these there were no equivalent to PAP and ECOSOCC in the \textsuperscript{16} There are 53 AU members. The withdrawal of Morocco was caused by the OAU admitting the Sahrawi Arab Republic (Western Sahara) as a member of the OAU. Since Western Sahara is not a member of the UN, there are thus also 53 members of the African Group at the UN (including Morocco).

\textsuperscript{18} The Court adopted its ‘interim Rules’ in June 2008.

OAU. The proliferation of institutions has led one commentator to suggest that there might be ‘a deliberative strategy to bring the notion of supra-national legality into disrepute through the creation of a multiplicity of under-resourced and deliberatively ineffectual institutions.’\(^\text{20}\) It is too early to assess whether recent increases in the budget allocated to the African Commission by the AU will make it more effective.\(^\text{21}\) However, it can no longer blame lack of resources. It is noticeable that African regional institutions such as the African Commission often do not publish the result of its work. With little in the way of visible results many observers tend to neglect their work.

In addition to the organs established under the AU there are a number of regional economic communities that could play an important role in the protection of human rights: the Arab Maghreb Union, the Common Market for Eastern and Southern Africa (COMESA), the East African Community (EAC), the Economic Community of Central African States (ECCAS), the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD) and the Southern African Development Community (SADC).\(^\text{22}\) ECOWAS is the most developed with regard to human rights as the Protocol establishing the ECOWAS Community Court of Justice, as amended, gives the Court explicit jurisdiction to hear human rights cases brought by individuals.\(^\text{23}\)

\(^{20}\) CA Odinkalu ‘Back to the future: The imperative of prioritizing for the protection of human rights in Africa’ (2003) 47 Journal of African Law 1. With regard to resources it should be noted that the budget of the AU has increased substantially over the last few years.

\(^{23}\) The ECOWAS Court of Justice is directly accessible by ECOWAS citizens claiming human rights violations.
5.2.3 Interaction between the APRM and international human rights monitoring bodies

The APRM Panel got exposure to human rights issues at an early stage. At its first meeting, in Cape Town in July 2003 the members of the Panel were addressed by the acting UN High Commissioner for Human Rights.24 However, since then there has been a lack of involvement of international human rights bodies with the APRM. No member of an international human rights monitoring body has participated in a country review mission. This is particularly noteworthy with regard to the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights, which is listed as one of the APRM partner institutions.25

Co-operation between the APRM structures and the African Commission within the current framework is necessary, but not sufficient to make both institutions more efficient in the promotion and protection of human rights. African human rights instruments should form the basis of human rights related parts of the review and inform the development of the questions in a revised Questionnaire in a clearer way.26 The African Commission, the African Committee on the Rights and Welfare of the Child and other relevant organs should be closely involved in the development of these questions.

25 In an interview with the author in April 2008, Dr Angela Melo, vice-chair of the African Commission noted that the Commission had made some efforts to establish contact with the APRM but that these efforts had not been successful.

5.3 Commitment

5.3.1 Membership

The first ideas of the peer review system was based on the idea of a ‘club’ of willing states to which other African states could apply and which could reject a state if it did not fulfil certain governance criteria.\(^{27}\) In the end a voluntary ‘open’ process to which any member of the AU could sign up was selected. Some have argued that the APRM should be compulsory,\(^ {28}\) as would have been the case with the discarded CSSDCA peer review process. However, there is much to be said for the position that the voluntariness of the process is ‘key to its effectiveness’ as co-operation would be more difficult to obtain in a compulsory process.\(^ {29}\) However, as noted below some countries have seemingly signed up to the process as a publicity stunt rather than from a genuine conviction that the APRM can assist the country in overcoming governance challenges.

The MOU was signed at the NEPAD Implementation Committee meeting on 9 March 2003 by Algeria, Congo-Brazzaville, Ethiopia, Ghana, Kenya, Mozambique, Nigeria, Rwanda, South Africa and Uganda.\(^ {30}\) As the MOU stipulated that the APRM would be operational on the day on which the fifth Member State of the African Union deposited the signed MOU, the process was in effect from this day.

By the end of May 2003 Burkina Faso, Cameroon, Gabon, Mali and Senegal had also signed the MOU. In 2004 another eight countries signed the MOU:

\(^{27}\) Interview with Stephen Gelb, Pretoria, 4 June 2009.

Angola, Benin, Egypt, Lesotho, Malawi, Mauritius, Sierra Leone and Tanzania. Sudan and Zambia signed the MOU in January 2006, Saõ Tomé and Príncipe in January 2007, Djibouti in July 2007 and Mauritania in January 2008. Togo became the 29th state to sign the MOU in July 2008. The participation of Mauritania has been suspended following a coup d’état.

A state that does no longer want to participate in the process can give notice to the Secretariat to this effect. Such a notice takes effect six months after it has been received, thus allowing an ongoing review to be concluded.\textsuperscript{31}

5.3.2 Why states commit to the APRM

The AU Summit in July 2005 urged all member states to join the APRM ‘as a matter of priority’ and to ‘strengthen the APRM process for its efficient performance’.\textsuperscript{32} In May 2006 the sixth African Governance Forum was held, organised by the UNDP. The theme was ‘Implementing the African Peer Review Mechanism – Challenges and opportunities’. Seven countries that had not signed up for the APRM participated in the Forum.\textsuperscript{33}

The reasons for not participating obviously vary from country to country.\textsuperscript{34} A country like Somalia that does not have a government controlling the territory of the state obviously would not sign up. Seemingly the same would apply to states with extremely serious human rights and governance problems.\textsuperscript{35} Equatorial Guinea, Eritrea and Zimbabwe are some of the countries falling in \textsuperscript{31} MOU para 32.

\textsuperscript{32} Declaration on the review of the Millennium Declaration and the Millennium Development Goals. Assembly/AU/Decl. 1 (V).
\textsuperscript{34} G Masterson \textit{Governance quality and government commitment to the NEPAD African peer review mechanism} (2004) explores why states commit to the APRM with case studies of Angola, DRC, Ghana and Botswana to the APRM. Masterson mistakenly refer to the DRC as having signed up for the APRM, Masterson (2004) 40.
this category. Surprisingly Sudan signed the MOU in January 2006. This could be seen as an example of a state under increasing international pressure coming to the conclusion that agreeing to be reviewed would at least not weaken its already tarnished international reputation. Sudan’s attempts to secure the chairmanship of the AU when it hosted the Khartoum summit in January 2006 could also have played a role.\(^\text{36}\)

Other countries have totally opposite reasons to opt out from the process. Botswana decided not to join the APRM because ‘the country feels it has already opened its economy to enough international scrutiny, while the political review process will be too difficult to implement because the issues are not quantitative.’\(^\text{37}\) Botswana already has a reputation for good governance and therefore feels the process is unnecessary and that the review process might lead to changes to its already existing development plan, Vision 2016.\(^\text{38}\)

The frank criticism expressed in the reports which have been finalised so far has in some cases surprised the governments. After Rwanda was reviewed in 2005 its Minister of Foreign Affairs, Charles Murigande, stated:\(^\text{39}\)

\begin{quote}
Rwanda knows very well that it (Rwanda) is not a paradise, but we invited people and we put ourselves bare-necked to be assessed and to be told where our weaknesses lie … But to have come up with such a criticism, it surprised us.
\end{quote}

At the APRM Forum in July 2007 which discussed the country review report on South Africa, President Mbeki seemed shocked about some criticism against the state of his country. President Mbeki said that the finding that there was an \(^{36}\) However, the attempt to secure the chairmanship was unsuccessful mainly due to international outrage over the Darfur crisis. Instead the chair of the AU was given to Congo-Brazzaville.

\(^{39}\) ‘Rwanda to send 1,200 troops to Darfur in mid-July’, Reuters, 4 July 2005.
‘unacceptably high level of violent crime’ was populist and that the finding of the report that ‘xenophobic tendencies prevail’ in South Africa was ‘simply not true’.40

These examples illustrate that some countries may believe they have a relatively good governance record and therefore sign up for the review, just to be disappointed with the outcome. This may lead other countries sensitive of criticism to not sign up to be reviewed or if they have already done so delay the process.

Arguably, the APRM would have its greatest potential in countries with governments which are open to suggestions on how to rectify shortcomings, whether from its own citizens or from outsiders. Democracy and an active civil society would make the dialogue easier, but would as the South African example illustrate not always be sufficient.

Among the states that have signed up for the APRM are some that would hardly have met any criteria with regards to respect for human rights and democracy. One way of measuring democracy is to see if a state is viewed as a democracy by its peers. 21 African countries were invited by the Convening Group to the Fourth Ministerial Meeting of the Community of Democracies in Bamako, Mali, in November 2007.41 Of the 29 states that have signed the APRM MOU only 13

41 They were: Benin, Botswana, Cape Verde, Ghana, Kenya, Lesotho, Liberia, Madagascar, Malawi, Mali, Mauritius, Morocco, Mozambique, Namibia, Niger, Sao Tome and Principe, Senegal, Seychelles, South Africa, Tanzania and Zambia. were invited to the meeting, while another 10 where on the list of countries invited as observers.\textsuperscript{42} Ethiopia, whose Prime Minister, Meles Zenawi, is the current chairperson of the APRM Forum, is among the countries which were not even invited as an observer.

Considering the constraints and delays that have plagued the process, it might be good that the queue for assessment is not longer than it is.\textsuperscript{43} It should however also be noted that many of the countries that have signed up have not yet started the national process.\textsuperscript{44} This is in particular so with countries with none or limited democratic credentials.

\textbf{5.3.3 Financing the APRM}

The high cost involved might also discourage some states from signing up to the process. The APRM is not funded through the AU budget. In the MOU the participating states agree to ‘contribute fully to the funding of the African Peer Review Mechanism in order to affirm the African ownership of the Mechanism. This includes sourcing funds from African people, businesses and institutions.’\textsuperscript{45} The Forum has decided that a country that has signed the APRM MOU should contribute at least US$ 100 000 annually to the APRM Secretariat.\textsuperscript{46} Only a few countries have fulfilled this requirement. From 2004 to the end of October 2008 the APRM raised nearly US$ 17.5 million from member states. South Africa was \textsuperscript{42} The APRM countries which were not invited as participants or observers were Angola, Ethiopia, Gabon, Sudan and Togo.

\textsuperscript{43} This problem was confirmed by the chairperson of the APRM Panel at a press briefing ahead of the 6th Africa Governance Forum organised by the UNDP in May 2006. See www.undp.org/agf/working/Press%20Briefing-AGF6.pdf (accessed 16 May 2006).

the single largest contributor to the APRM budget with a contribution of US$ 6 million. 47

An APRM Trust Fund has been established and managed by the UNDP. Non-African contributions to the Trust Fund from 2004 to the end of October 2008 were more than US$ 13 million. 48

Estimated expenditure for regional APRM activities in 2008 was US$ 5.3 million. Of this a bit over US$ 3 million was expenditure for the Secretariat. The cost of review visits and support missions was estimated at US$ 1.4 million. 49 This does not include the participation of staff from the African Development Bank, UNECA and UNDP as these organisations fund their own participation in country review visits and support missions. 50 It should also be noted that the Development Bank of Southern Africa has provided ‘treasury services, including a bridging facility of ZAR 10 million, along with financial and accounting, disbursement, procurement and contracting, legal, logistical, and human resource management services.’ 51 South Africa is to continue to bear some costs for the Secretariat under the host agreement concluded in October 2008.

The reliance on contributions from states that will undergo review could be criticised. A state that got a bad review could refuse to contribute financially. However, it is questionable whether a financing under the regular AU budget would be a feasible alternative considering the resource constraints facing various AU organs. Since the APRM process is voluntary, financing under the regular AU budget would also surely be controversial among states not participating in the process. Donor funding is also problematic.\textsuperscript{52} The establishment of the Trust Fund is a way to avoid conditionality. African ownership of the APRM is important to ensure credibility and the increased reliance on funding from the UNDP and other donors risks compromising the APRM.\textsuperscript{53}

In addition to financing the international secretariat and review process each participating state must also finance its own national review process. This includes the cost of the in-country part of the country review mission. The cost of the Ghana APRM process until the completion of the self-assessment was US$ 1.5 million.\textsuperscript{54} The budget for South Africa’s national APRM process (2005-2006) was ZAR 20.5 million (US$ 3 million).\textsuperscript{55} The National Focal Point of Nigeria has indicated that the federal government had spent US$ 14 million on the APRM process by March 2008.\textsuperscript{56} In Kenya the APRM process was funded through a ‘basket fund’ administered by the UNDP. The UNDP contributed almost US$ 1 million to the fund.\textsuperscript{57} Slow disbursement of funds created problems in implementing the various activities within the timeframes set.\textsuperscript{58} Similar problems have been noted with regard to the UNDP administered fund for the APRM process in Benin.\textsuperscript{59} In March 2006 the Tanzanian Ministry of Planning, Economy and Empowerment estimated that the national review process would cost about US$ 1 million. The UNDP had allocated US$ 200,000 while the remaining funds would be requested from the government and

The lack of take-off of the APRM process in some countries can be explained by lack of genuine willingness (some seemingly signing up for the APRM because they were on the NEPAD Implementation Committee at the time), fear of critical reports and lack of finances. With regard to the last issue, donor countries may feel that countries that have not reached a certain governance level will not benefit from the process and they will therefore not provide money to assist with the implementation of the self-assessment process.

As has been noted above financing from donors is available to conduct the reviews. In addition donors have promised to provide financial assistance to assist in the implementation of the Programmes of Action. As the cost of the reviews are minor compared to the cost of implementing the POAs, it is difficult to neglect this as an incentive for participation in the APRM despite the assertion of President Kagame of Rwanda that the APRM should not be perceived as an instrument to access foreign resources or to please donors, but rather as a process to improve the national policy making, sharing of experiences and creating a conducive environment for investments, all of which are in our best interests.

The G8 reaffirm their commitments to actively support countries that implement sound policies consistent with the recommendations of the APRM. We will support these countries in implementing their national Plans of Action to make progress in achieving the MDGs by 2015. Consequently, we commit ourselves and encourage others to give priority attention to the results of the reviews in their own strategies for bilateral and regional cooperation.

Despite this commitment a 2007 study showed that it is only Canada and the UK of major donors which explicitly rely on the APRM country review reports for governance assessment which in turn influence decisions on aid.64 The House of Lords has called on the EU to support the APRM process and to use the outcome of the APRM process to determine where aid should go but to avoid ‘specify the means by which countries implement any recommendations made.’65

The funding of POA implementation will be discussed further below and in the case studies in part II of this study.

5.3.4 Commitment to human rights treaties

All AU members have acceded to the African Charter and all but Somalia to the CRC. CEDAW has been ratified by all African countries except Somalia and Sudan, the ICCPR by all except the Comoros, Guinea-Bissau and Saô Tomé and Principe, CERD by all except Angola, Djibouti, Guinea-Bissau and Saô Tomé and Principe and ICESCR by all except Botswana, the Comoros, Mozambique, Saô Tomé and Principe and South Africa. As on the global level CAT is the least ratified of the six main human rights treaties, with ten African states not having ratified this treaty, including Angola, Saô Tomé and Principe, Sudan and Tanzania of countries that have signed up for the APRM. Nineteen AU members have not ratified the first Optional Protocol to the Covenant on 65 House of Lords, European Union Committee (2006) para 490. See also paras 234-252.

Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) allowing for individual complaints to the Human Rights Committee. These include nine states that have signed up for the APRM, including Kenya and Rwanda.66 Seemingly there is no significant difference in the levels of commitment to international human rights law between the 29 states that have signed up for the APRM review process and the 24 AU members that have not.

The commitment to international human rights law through ratification of treaties is often only rhetorical. As with signing up to the APRM, there are many different factors that contribute to whether a state decides to become a state party to an international human rights treaty. International commitments entail costs to bring practices into conformity with the norms.67 These costs are not always realised because of weaknesses in ensuring compliance that will be discussed further below. Thus a state can use the ratification of a treaty as ‘window-dressing’ if it considers it unlikely that the cost of commitment will actually be realised.68 This could explain Hathaway’s finding that ‘ratification of the treaties by individual countries appears more likely to offset pressure for change in human rights practices than to augment it.’69

5.4 Compliance theory

To comply is to ‘act according to accepted standards’. A step towards such substantive compliance is implementation of the standards, ‘the process of putting international commitments into practice’. This can be done for example through legislation and the creation of institutions. The fact that rules have been implemented does not necessarily mean that compliance in the sense of ‘rule-consistent behaviour’ has been achieved.

It should also be noted that even if norms have been complied with this does not necessarily mean that they are effective in achieving the objective sought. This difference between compliance and effectiveness is apparent in the APRM; not everyone agrees that the prescriptions of the APRM framework documents and the standards to which they refer will bring about the ultimate objective of development and poverty eradication. Indeed, popular will could often contradict agreed standards.

The clarity of the norms also affects the effectiveness of an agreement. Human rights are often vaguely defined in international treaties. Many agreements also include imprecise limitations of the rights. Fortunately international human rights law have developed a lot over the last decades through interpretation both by international and national bodies. In addition to judicial and quasi-judicial pronunciations on the contents of rights, general comments and resolutions have been adopted to give a more precise meaning to the content of human rights norms.

The aim of compliance with international human rights law is to achieve ‘rule-consistent behaviour on the domestic level’. The rest of this chapter will discuss what factors contribute to compliance with international law and in

In How nations behave Henkin posited that ‘almost all nations observe almost all principles of international law and almost all of their obligations almost all of the time.’\(^74\) However, international law comprises many different fields and it is clear that compliance varies.\(^75\) Compliance with ‘coordination agreements’ is very high.\(^76\) Some regulatory agreements require little change in behaviour and therefore have high compliance rates.\(^77\) The situation is different with regard to agreements that require major changes in policy and practice at the domestic level, such as human rights treaties. Human rights are often singled out as having the largest compliance gap.\(^78\)

Realists argue that compliance occur when state interest and rule-consistent behaviour converges as the ‘rational actor’ considers the cost and benefit of compliance.\(^79\) The supporters of managerialism argue that states generally comply with international law if they can.\(^80\) Compliance is achieved through dialogue. In their view capacity building is the major tool to address non-compliance.\(^81\) Another theory hypothesises that compliance follows if norms and the institutions set up to monitor compliance with them are perceived as

\(^{77}\) This may also have to do with the required conduct is specific. Franck notes that ‘[r]ules which have a readily accessible meaning and which say what they expect of those who are addressed are more likely to have a real impact on conduct.’ T Franck Fairness in international law and institutions (1995) 30-31, 99-100.

legitimate and just.\textsuperscript{82} Many variations on these theories have been put forward.\textsuperscript{83} The managerial school with its focus on dialogue is seemingly the closest to the philosophy underlying the APRM.

A number of statistical studies have found that ratification of international human rights treaties does not necessarily lead to improved respect for human rights.\textsuperscript{84} It is clear that merely adopting a constitution with a comprehensive bill of rights or ratifying an international human rights treaty does not necessarily change the human rights situation in a country for the better.\textsuperscript{85} As noted by Shue: ‘A proclamation of a right is not the fulfilment of a right, anymore than an airplane schedule is a flight.’\textsuperscript{86}

Statistical analysis has been used to try to determine the factors that contribute to human rights violations. These studies have generally focused on repression, such as the incidence of torture, forced disappearances and extra-judicial executions. Statistical information for these studies has been obtained by coding for example the annual human rights reports of the US State Department and Amnesty International.\textsuperscript{87} Factors that has been identified as contributing to repression include the type of regime (democratic regimes are less repressive), the level of economic development and the presence of armed conflict.\textsuperscript{88} While there has been little focus on socio-economic rights, there is a large body of literature on what factors inhibit development, in particular the relationship between democracy and development.

There is no agreement on the methodology to be used for statistical analysis. Some argue that it is not possible to construct a framework that takes into consideration all the complexities of compliance. It is noteworthy that the quantitative studies cited above only consider the direct impact of treaty ratification. They do not consider for example if states that have complied with formal requirements, such as state reporting, have a higher degree of compliance with the norms. The reality of compliance with human rights norms is seemingly more complex than can be articulated in a statistical theory.

International articulation of rights norms has reshaped domestic dialogues in law, politics, academia, public consciousness, civil society, and the press. International human rights law also facilitates international and transnational processes that reinforce, stimulate, and monitor these domestic dialogues. While reliable quantitative measurement is probably impossible, by strengthening domestic rights institutions, international human rights law has brought incalculable, indirect benefits for rights protection.

Detailed qualitative studies of the effectiveness of the international human rights system are few. The study by Heyns and Viljoen on the impact of six core UN human rights treaties in 20 countries is the most elaborate of these studies. Other studies have focused on the impact of complaints procedures, state reporting and the monitoring methods of the UN special procedures. As in the quantitative studies cited above, to establish causation is also a problem in qualitative studies. In addition it can be difficult to draw general conclusions from a small group of countries.

Heyns and Viljoen find several factors that limit the impact of treaty monitoring. The limiting factors include reluctance to implement recommendations, ignorance and lack of coordination, lack of ‘domestic human rights culture’, poverty and traditional practices. Among factors that contribute to compliance they list media coverage, national action plans, NGO mobilisation facilitated by access to information such as concluding observations, international donor pressure and education.

The dearth of studies is indicative that the impact of international monitoring is difficult, if not impossible, to measure. Monitoring reinforces the domestic debate; it is seldom the only reason for change. An evaluation of international monitoring methods must thus focus on the extent to which a monitoring method has the potential of contributing to the ongoing debate at the domestic level. A consequence of this is that there is reason to be pessimistic about any impact of international monitoring in countries where there is little opportunity for domestic dialogue.

5.5 International monitoring methods

In the following I will discuss the main methods of international monitoring in the field of human rights starting with other peer review mechanisms. Thereafter state reporting, independent fact-finding and complaints procedures are considered with a focus on how the APRM compares to these measures.\textsuperscript{100} An attempt will be made to consider to which degree the various mechanisms play a role in inducing compliance in addition to their obvious role of assessing compliance.\textsuperscript{101} Thereafter specific factors which could affect the role of a monitoring mechanism in inducing compliance are considered such as the normative framework, the expertise and independence of monitoring bodies, peer and public pressure, assistance and sanctions.

5.5.1 Peer review

The OECD makes use of peer review in a number of policy areas: economic policy, environment, development cooperation, public management service, trade, financial, fiscal and enterprise affairs, science, technology and industry, education, labour and social affairs, agriculture/fisheries and energy.\textsuperscript{102} The European Union has developed a similar mechanism called the Open Method of Co-ordination (OMC).\textsuperscript{103} Noteworthy in the context of human rights are the anti-corruption peer reviews conducted by the OECD, the Council of Europe\textsuperscript{104} and under the Inter-American Convention against Corruption.\textsuperscript{105}

Schäfer sets out the following six elements of a peer review:\textsuperscript{106}

- Definition of legally non-binding common goals
- Exclusively national implementation
- Monitoring and reporting by the Secretariat including bilateral contacts
- Multilateral discussion (peer pressure)
- Country-specific recommendations (non-enforceable)
- Publication of the results (public pressure)

Schäfer’s six elements illustrate the similarities and differences with the APRM process as set out in chapter 4.\textsuperscript{107} One difference is that most peer reviews do not require the development of a Programme of Action, a central feature of the APRM process. This aspect is however not absent in all peer reviews. For example, under the EU OMC process some reviews demand that governments develop national action plans.\textsuperscript{108} Another difference is that most peer reviews make use of civil servants of other member states to conduct the fact-finding part of the review. The APRM in contrast rely to a large degree on other international organisations in complementing its own staff. In his schematic presentation Schäfer takes note of the importance of both peer pressure and public pressure. This is equally important for the APRM.

Peer review covering human rights was an APRM novelty, but the UN has followed suit. When the UN Human Rights Commission was transformed into the Human Rights Council in 2006 it was decided that all countries should undergo regular periodic review by the Council of their compliance with human rights norms. The modalities of what came to be known as the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) were developed by the Council. It was decided that the reviews should be undertaken in four-year cycles with three sessions per year. 48 states are reviewed each year. All UN member states are scheduled to have been reviewed by the end of 2011. The first UPR session was held in Geneva from 7 to 18 April 2008.

The UPR review is based on a national report, a report summarising findings by UN human rights bodies and a report summarising submissions by other stakeholders, including NGOs and national human rights institutions. The national report should be maximum 20 pages and the other summary reports, prepared by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights, maximum 10 pages each. The review is conducted through an ‘interactive dialogue’ before the UPR working group of the Council. The review of each country is allocated three hours. All states may participate in the dialogue. Other stakeholders may attend but not participate in the review. After the dialogue a report is prepared by the troika, a group of three rapporteurs representing members of the UPR working group, in addition to the country under review. The report includes the recommendations to the reviewed state put forward during the interactive dialogue and the state’s response to these recommendations. The report of the troika is adopted by the working group. A few weeks later the report is presented to the plenary of the Human Rights Council which adopts the outcome report after inviting the state under review and other stakeholders, including states and NGOs, to make comments. All reports and other documents which form part of the UPR country review are published on the OHCHR website.

The UPR was originally perceived as ‘a chamber of peer review’. Though peer review was not retained in the final name, the UPR share most of the characteristics of a peer review process as discussed above: reporting by the Secretariat, peer pressure through multilateral discussion, non-enforceable recommendations and public pressure through publication of the results. The country under review explicitly endorses the recommendations emanating from the process which it wants to take on board. These recommendations thus take on the form of a plan of action, progress with which can be measured in the next round of reviews. However, it must be noted that the recommendations are often vague and that there is no discussion on how to finance new interventions. The UPR also share some characteristics with state reporting, but it is noticeable that while in the state reporting process NGOs have the possibility to comment on the state report through submission of shadow reports, under the UPR stakeholders make their submissions prior to the submission by the state of its report.

An evaluation of the first session of the UPR notes that it has ‘shown the potential for providing a political forum for following up treaty bodies and charter bodies’ activities and Recommendations’ but that it is also used as a ‘pat-on-the-back’ exercise in particular by African states.\textsuperscript{118}

5.5.2 State reporting

To have states report on regular intervals on their implementation of international agreements to an independent body set up under the agreement is one of the most common methods of trying to induce compliance with international norms. Because of the similarities with the APRM process, state reporting will here be treated in some detail.

Provisions on state reporting on human rights

State reporting to an international body was first provided for after World War I by the International Labour Organisation (ILO) to monitor compliance with international labour standards.\textsuperscript{119} This system is still in place.\textsuperscript{120} The ILO reviews its 178 members annually. States are required to send reports on ratified conventions to the ILO with copies to workers’ organisations and employers’ organisations. The Committee of Experts on the Application of Conventions and Recommendations examines nearly 2000 reports at its annual meetings. The report of the Committee of Experts goes to the Committee on the Application of Standards of the International Labour Conference, composed of representatives of governments, employers and workers. A dialogue with the government under review is held in the Committee, usually led by the employers’ and workers’ representatives of the reviewed country.\footnote{121}

The UN main human rights conventions, ICCPR, ICESCR, CERD, CEDAW, CAT, CRC and CMW, and other human rights conventions such as the UNESCO Convention against Discrimination in Education, all provide for state reporting. The human rights conventions provide that states shall report on implementation of the treaties at regular intervals ranging from two to five years. The reports are examined by a committee of independent experts set up under the treaty.

At the regional level article 62 of the African Charter provides for states to submit reports on the implementation of the Charter every two years.\footnote{122} It is not clear from the Charter which organ should examine these reports. Shortly after its establishment the African Commission in 1988 requested the OAU Assembly to entrust it with this task. The request was granted and the same year the Commission adopted Guidelines for National Periodic Reports.\footnote{123} State reporting on human rights exists also in the other regional human rights systems.\footnote{124}

\footnote{123} On these and further guidelines on state reporting by the Commission see Viljoen (2007) 371-373.

\footnote{124} In the European system state reporting is the main monitoring mechanism under the European Social Charter. Under the European Convention on Human Rights state reporting is only at request and not regular. The Additional Protocol to the American Convention on Human Rights in the area of economic, social and cultural rights includes a state reporting mechanism.
Objectives of state reporting

The Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights has in a general comment set out the objectives of state reporting as follows:

- Comprehensive review of national legislation and administrative rules, procedures and practices
- Ensuring that the state monitors the actual situation with respect to each of the rights
- Establishment of principled policy-making by government
- Facilitate public scrutiny of government policies
- Basis for effective evaluation by government and Committee
- Provide better understanding by state party to problems and shortcomings
- Facilitate exchange of information among states

The focus is clearly on the state’s self-assessment of the situation in the country. If the state itself is the only one involved in this assessment the risk for an inadequate report increases. The reports risk becoming purely copies of constitutional provisions without any reference to actual practice. Civil society should be involved in the preparation of a state report, but this should never go as far as diminishing the role of the state as the author and the entity ultimately responsible for the report and the implementation of human rights. Zambia’s 2003 report to the CESCR Committee indicates a balancing of state and civil society input in the process:

The preparation of Zambia’s initial report for submission to the United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights involved the participation of academia, civil society and all relevant line ministries. This exercise provided the Government with an opportunity to review relevant policies, legislation and administrative practices bringing to the fore the various challenges and difficulties that the Government faces in effecting the full realization of economic, social and cultural rights. The exercise further availed the Government of the opportunity of identifying new ways in which to overcome the various challenges that Zambia faces in the implementation of economic, social and cultural rights.\textsuperscript{127}

However, despite this effort, the CESCR Committee in its concluding observations stated that the information provided was not sufficient for the Committee to be fully able to assess developments in the status of implementation of most of the Covenant’s provisions … [The Committee] regrets that there were not enough members in the delegation who were expert in all economic, social and cultural rights and could provide more information to the Committee …\textsuperscript{128}

Civil society participation is more integral to the APRM process than what is the case in state reporting in most countries. In addition the country review visit gives opportunity to interaction with all stakeholders and should therefore improve the information flow.

\textit{Submission of reports}

States are often tardy with their reports or do not submit them at all. Factors that have been raised by the states for non-reporting include: state of emergency,\textsuperscript{129} deep social and economic crisis,\textsuperscript{130} war and genocide\textsuperscript{131} and lack of personnel trained in drafting reports.\textsuperscript{132} To address the last of these issues donor funding specifically for a state to fulfil its reporting obligations is becoming increasingly common.\textsuperscript{133} Support has for example been given by international organisations with field offices in the country reporting.\textsuperscript{134}

The slow take-off of the process in many countries that have signed up for the APRM reflects similar constraints as those that affect the late submission of state reports. Financing is an even more important factor with regard to the APRM as it is a more costly process than state reporting.

\textit{Other sources of information}

One NGO observer has described the meetings of the UN human rights treaty bodies where they discuss state reports as ‘a strange diplomatic ritual’ where committee members ‘pose gently worded questions’ and the government representatives ‘are unable to respond to the questions but are particularly able at talking around the subject in a lengthy and uninformative response.’\textsuperscript{135} For the examination to be meaningful the Committee members, who most of the time do not have expert knowledge on the country under examination, must be exposed to other sources on the situation in the country than the state report.\textsuperscript{136} The chairperson of the Human Rights Committee has stated that NGOs serve as the ‘eyes, ears and hands’ of the treaty monitoring bodies.\textsuperscript{137} NGOs play an important role both at the national level and by providing the monitoring body with information that could raise issues that have been omitted from the official state report.

State reports to the UN committees are put on the web site of the OHCHR as soon as they have been received. The dates of consideration of the reports are also published well in advance. These measures have improved the access of NGOs to the process. Apart from national NGOs submitting shadow reports, some international NGOs, for example Amnesty International, publish reports linking their concerns with state reports that will come up for scrutiny.

In Africa the input by NGOs towards monitoring by the African Commission has been severely hampered by lack of access to state reports. Despite provisions in the activity reports that the reports and concluding observations should be published this have not been done. However, recently state reports have been published on the web site of the African Commission prior to the session at which the reports were to be considered. This is to be welcomed as many times governments are not keen to inform NGOs in advance.\(^{138}\)

Independent information can come from other sources than NGOs. For example, UNICEF provides the Committee on the Rights of the Child with information on states that are scheduled for review.\(^{139}\)

The flow of information obviously creates problems in that the volume of information that a monitoring body receives can become more than it can handle. To verify information is also often problematic.\(^{140}\) In contrast, the APRM provides for much more active information gathering, both at the national and international level and means of on-site verification. However, the lack of transparency in various stages of the APRM process is a matter of concern.

Establishment of principled policy-making

According to the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights one of the outcomes of the state reporting process should be the ‘establishment of principled policy-making by government’.¹⁴¹ This important aspect has largely been lacking as states have focused their reporting on existing legislation and policy.¹⁴² State reporting provides for no equivalent to the APRM Programme of Action.

Dialogue between the state and the monitoring body

When a report is received by the Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights in Geneva, which functions as the secretariat of the committees, it is first translated. In the past the Secretariat of the African Commission did not translate reports, which led to a situation where some of the Commissioners could not participate in the discussion.¹⁴³

For the first years of its existence the CERD Committee examined state reports without delegations from the country concerned participating in the examination process. From 1972 states were given the opportunity to participate in the process. As pointed out by Tomuschat examination ‘without a counterpart would have deprived the process of any effectiveness.’¹⁴⁴

¹⁴⁴ Tomuschat (2003) 143
An indicator of whether a state takes the work of the committees seriously is the level and size of the delegation that presents the report.\textsuperscript{145} However it should be noted that resources could be a limiting factor for poor countries in this regard. One advantage of the African Commission over the UN treaty bodies is that one of the two annual sessions of the Commission is often held outside its headquarters in Banjul. The fact that the UN treaty bodies only meet in Geneva or New York is a limitation on NGO engagement. The examination by the Human Rights Committee of the first report of the United States under the ICCPR took place in New York, thus allowing NGOs ‘a remarkable opportunity to work with the Committee members.’\textsuperscript{146}

The APRM country review mission can be seen as an external validation of the self-assessment. It is thus a much more elaborate and time consuming process than the more formal setting of discussing a state report in Geneva or other places far away from the country under review.

\textit{Concluding observations}

In 1984 the Human Rights Committee started to publish concluding observations by individual Committee members. Since the early 1990’s all the treaty bodies adopt collective concluding observations setting out what the Committee considers to be positive and negative developments with regard to implementation of the treaty. When the state is reviewed the next time the concluding observations from the previous session forms one of the basis for the examination. The African Commission has started to adopt concluding observations, but since these are not published they are of limited effect.

The APRM country review report is the equivalent of the concluding observations of treaty monitoring bodies. While concluding observations are quite brief, the country review reports are long and it can therefore be harder to quickly get a clear overview of the main issues. However, the more lengthy APRM reports allow the Panel to substantiate their views more clearly, setting out the reasons for their position on a certain issue.

\textsuperscript{146} Clapham (2000) 180. On the need to ‘bring the treaty system to the people’ see also Heyns & Viljoen (2002) 39.

Follow-up

The Committee on the Rights of the Child was the first to adopt a follow-up procedure to its concluding observations, in 1999. Despite the limited follow-up activities an official of the High Commissioner, commenting in 2000, was of the view that states are mindful of … concluding observations and do take them into consideration when preparing their next periodic report; some have used them as a basis for amendments to domestic legislation.

A lack of compliance with a recommendation or decision is often not showing that the state is unwilling. Rather the state is unable to comply and therefore in need of assistance. Article 45(b) of the Convention on the Rights of the Child provides that the Committee shall contact other bodies if a need for technical assistance is indicated in a report. To send concluding observations to the UN resident coordinator in the country that has been reviewed as well as field offices where such exist could improve the possibilities for implementation.

147 However, cf the state reporting system under the European Social Charter where the report of the European Committee on Social Rights (the equivalent of concluding observations) can be over 100 pages. P Alston ‘Assessing the strengths and weaknesses of the European Social Charter’s supervisory system’ in Grainne de Burca and Bruno de Witte (eds) Social rights in Europe (2005a) 52. Similarly to the ILO, these conclusions are first drafted by the Secretariat, a draft which forms the basis for the Committee’s discussion. Alston (2005a) 59.

Follow-up should not be left only to the expert bodies themselves. Political organs have an important role to play. Nowak talks of a ‘missing link between independent expert bodies and political decision-making bodies’. The Universal Periodic Review should ideally play the role of monitoring compliance both with recommendations from the state reporting process and decisions on individual complaints. Civil society also has an important role to play. A report on the impact of the UN treaty system in 20 countries concludes that the reporting process leads to negligible media coverage, though controversial issues raised in concluding observations sometimes gained media attention.

To summarise, a number of factors weaken the impact of state reporting. Information is often lacking, and the process does not allow for easy verification of information at hand. The review meetings are short, take place far away from the country under review and does only allow for the active participation of the state party. Fitzpatrick paints a rather dark, but essentially correct, picture of the potential effectiveness of the reporting system when she states that the report review system is posited on a utopian vision of constructive dialogue between knowledgeable and candid state representatives and treaty body members who can, through careful questioning informed only by a general expertise on human rights norms, assist the state to achieve compliance with the treaty.

153 Quashigah’s assertion that the state reporting system under the European Social Charter is effective and could therefore serve as a model for the African Commission is not reflecting the reality of that process which display many of the weaknesses of a state reporting system, in particular low levels of NGO engagement. 5.5.3 Independent fact-finding

Special rapporteurs and working groups

The UN Commission on Human Rights, now replaced by the Human Rights Council, developed a system of working groups and special rapporteurs, often referred to as special procedures. These have thematic or country-specific mandates. Thematic mandates can examine the situation with respect of the right it is monitoring in any country in the world. Country mandates may investigate all types of human rights violations in the country, non-regarding which international instruments the country has ratified. The holder of the mandate and members of a working group are appointed by the chairperson of the Human Rights Council, previously the Commission on Human Rights. The African Commission has also established special rapporteurs, all of which are members of the Commission. Working groups of the African Commission include both members of the Commission and other independent experts.

The working methods of the special procedures include country visits, where the special rapporteur discusses the human rights issue within his or her mandate with government officials and civil society and thereafter produces a report. Special rapporteurs in the UN system also respond to individual complaints and can issue urgent actions. Through their role as the eyes and ears of the Human Rights Council they are also in a good position to act as an early warning system on deteriorating situations.\footnote{155}{The term special rapporteur is here used to also cover a number of other titles are used such as special representative or independent expert. There is no clear distinction between these titles. For an overview and assessment of effectiveness see Nifosi (2005).} \footnote{156}{See Nifosi (2005) 134-135 for examples where special rapporteurs have fulfilled such a function. It should however be noted that this has not been followed up by any meaningful action from the Commission on Human Rights and other UN organs.}
Inquiry procedures

Inquiry procedures are provided for under article 20 of CAT and article 8 of the CEDAW Optional Protocol. When the Committee receives reliable information of systematic violations it invites the state party to respond to the allegations. A member of the Committee can be assigned to conduct a confidential inquiry. On-site visits can be undertaken as part of the inquiry if the cooperation of the state concerned is obtained. The inquiry procedures are confidential, but the reports of finalised inquiries have been published.\(^{157}\) ILO also has the possibility of instituting inquiry procedures.\(^{158}\)

The UN Security Council can use its chapter VII powers to establish inquiry procedures. A five-member Commission of Inquiry on Darfur was appointed by the UN Secretary-General in October 2004, following a Security Council Resolution. After on-site investigations the Commission presented its report to the Security Council in February 2005, leading the Council to submit the case for further investigation and possible prosecutions to the International Criminal Court. Another example is the international independent investigation Commission established in 2005 with a mandate to assist the Lebanese authorities to establish the truth behind the murder of former Prime Minister Hariri.\(^{159}\)

Reports by non-governmental organisations

Mention has already been made of the importance of civil society, national and international, to engage in the state reporting process. NGOs also have an important role to play in independent fact-finding. They form an important source of information for special rapporteurs and working groups and their reporting on human rights violations play an important role on its own in exerting public pressure that will be discussed further below.

On-site visits

Most of the UN special procedures conduct a few country visits every year. A limitation is obviously that a visit requires an invitation from the state concerned. The UN has therefore encouraged states to submit standing invitations. However, few such invitations have been forthcoming, especially from Africa.\(^{160}\) On-site visits by treaty bodies are rare. Preventative visits to places of detention are to be conducted under the Optional Protocol to the UN Convention against Torture, which recently entered into force.

The African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights conducts promotional and fact-finding visits to member countries, though the distinction between these types of missions is not always clear. The impact of the missions is limited due to late publication or no publication at all of mission reports. The African Commission could learn from the Inter-American Commission which has for a long time made use of on-site visits to produce reports on the situation of human rights in member countries.\(^{161}\)

One of the main problems with on-site visits is that they must take place within terms of the visit agreed on with the government. Since the authorities will know the whereabouts of the delegation it can prevent it from seeing persons it would like to see and prevent those wanting to give the delegation information from approaching it. Reprisals after a visit are also a possibility.\textsuperscript{162}

\(^{160}\) As of July 2009 66 countries had extended standing invitations. The only African countries were Ghana, Sierra Leone, South Africa and Zambia. See www.ohchr.org/english/bodies/chr/special/invitations.htm (accessed 19 August 2009).

The objective of the APRM country review mission is to validate the self-assessment, not to conduct independent fact-finding. Background reports etc produced by the APRM Secretariat as part of the review process are produced to assist in this process and remain confidential. However, in the process of validating the self-assessment the country review mission meet a variety of stakeholders. When there are discrepancies between the self-assessment and the views of stakeholders this has often been reflected in the country review reports. It should however be noted that the constraints of a programme controlled by the inviting government is a reality also in the APRM process. Reports that have been produced as part of the independent fact-finding procedures set out above should clearly form part of the APRM evaluation. Such reports should be considered in both the self-assessment and the country review.

\textbf{5.5.4 Field presence}

The UN High Commissioner for Human Rights has held that ‘an active presence in a country can often be considered to be the most effective way to engage.’\textsuperscript{163}

Field offices focus on technical cooperation and protection. In Africa the Office of the High Commissioner (OHCHR) has country offices in Angola, Togo and Uganda and regional field offices in Cameroon (for central Africa), Ethiopia (for eastern Africa) and South Africa (for southern Africa). In addition there are human rights components of peace missions in Burundi, Côte d'Ivoire, DRC,

\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
Eritrea/Ethiopia, Liberia, Sierra Leone and Sudan.\textsuperscript{164} The tendency to restrict field presences to conflict-torn areas is problematic.\textsuperscript{165}

It is difficult to staff a mission quickly with substantial numbers of persons who possess the necessary background knowledge, language ability, objectivity and field operational skills to produce credible evidence of a human rights situation in crisis. The mission may be confused as to whether its focus is moderating ongoing human rights violations or investigating and documenting massive violations of the immediate past.

Most field offices have a mandate covering both monitoring and technical cooperation.\textsuperscript{166} Sometimes a human rights field office serves as the main source of information to a country special rapporteur.\textsuperscript{167} The increased field presence has also given the OHCHR the opportunity to publish follow-up reports on undertakings by governments.\textsuperscript{168} Other UN agencies such as UNHCR and UNICEF are increasingly focusing on human rights in their fieldwork.\textsuperscript{169}

An APRM country review mission spends around three weeks in a country before it returns home to write up its report. There has been some criticism that there is a lack of knowledge of the country specific situation among the members that make up the review team.\textsuperscript{170} Obviously people that stay longer in a country, such as staff of field offices, often have a more in-depth knowledge of local conditions.

5.5.5 Complaints procedures

It is unlikely that one could talk of judicial human rights enforcement at the international level in Africa in the foreseeable future. The European Court of Human Rights has taken on a role much like a Constitutional Court of Europe, but as will be shown below there is little possibility of Africa emulating this system.\(^{171}\) This is not to say that the judiciary can not play a complementary role in the African human rights system.

All AU member states have ratified the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights.\(^ {172}\) Despite this the African Commission has only considered around 300 individual complaints in the 18 years that the institution has existed. In contrast the European Court of Human Rights had by September 2008 handed down 10 000 judgment since its inception. The case load of the European Court has increased dramatically in recent years and in 2007 alone the court delivered over 1 500 judgments and 27 000 inadmissibility decisions.\(^ {173}\) This figure is hardly an indication that the situation for human rights is more problematic in Europe than in Africa. Most would argue that the opposite is true. In addition the African Charter covers more rights than the European Convention and the victim requirement that limits the access of NGOs to the European system does not exist in Africa.\(^ {174}\) However, standing requirements in national courts can have a limiting effect since the system requires exhaustion of local remedies through the domestic court system.\textsuperscript{175}

Very few people on the continent have the resources to exhaust local remedies in countries where legal aid is non-existent.\textsuperscript{176} If the African Commission and Court for this reason interpreted the admissibility criteria in the Charter generously, the flood gate may open, but only if victims of human rights violations would see the regional system as an effective resort.

A study on compliance by African countries with decisions adopted by the African Commission and the UN Human Rights Committee shows that the compliance rate with decisions from both these bodies is very low.\textsuperscript{177} In contrast, compliance with the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights is quite good.\textsuperscript{178} A case remains on the agenda of the Committee of Ministers until the remedy ordered by the European Court has been complied with. To uphold compliance with the judgments of the European Court requires both peer and public pressure.\textsuperscript{179} It must also be noted that the system is in need of constant revision to make it more efficient, as its success is the main reason for its heavy caseload.

\textsuperscript{175} However, also the principle of exhaustion of local remedies has been interpreted generously for the complainant. See eg \textit{Purohit and Another v The Gambia} (2003) AHRLR 96 (ACHPR 2003).

\textsuperscript{177} Viljoen & Louw (2007). However, Doebbler (2003) 8-9, notes that African states have generally respected international law. As evidence he gives high rates of treaty ratification and compliance with international judgments. Whether high compliance with ICJ judgments, which is the example Doebbler gives, will mean high compliance with the judgments of the African human rights court remains to be seen.

Getting the facts right is important to ensure credibility.\textsuperscript{180} This together with the importance of well-reasoned judgments or decisions can in turn affect compliance. The remedies for a human rights violation set out by the monitoring body can also affect the likelihood of compliance. Shelton has held that ‘[n]on-monetary awards can be difficult to adjudicate, formulate, administer and enforce.’\textsuperscript{181} Compensation can never fully remedy a violation, but monitoring bodies that do not award compensation, such as the African Commission and the UN treaty bodies, risk being neglected.

The discussion above has dealt with the complaints system under the African Charter. Much the same is true for the UN treaty bodies which can receive complaints from African individuals. Kirby sees ratification of the Optional Protocol to the CCPR, allowing for individual complaints to the UN Human Rights Committee, as one of the most important indicators of implementation of human rights.\textsuperscript{182} Thirty African states have ratified this protocol. However, this system has not proved more effective than the African Commission. As Henry Steiner notes:

[The Human Rights Committee] is capable of issuing only about thirty views annually. On the other hand, well over a billion people inhabit the States that are parties to the Protocol, including many states with poor human rights protection. Although the Committee has produced a large and important body of decisions over the years that develop the Covenant’s provisions, it seems evident that the complaints procedure cannot serve as an effective ‘review’ of human rights violations that would assure individual justice and the rule of law within the States parties to the Protocol.\textsuperscript{183}

It is sometimes argued that a significant limitation in the individual complaints systems of the UN treaty system and the African Commission lies in the fact that their decisions are not legally binding. On the other hand there is nothing stopping states from treating the decisions of these bodies as binding in their national legal system through enabling legislation, as a few states, mainly in Latin America, have done.

More importantly, to have any chance of success, follow-up to the decisions taken by the monitoring body is needed. Under the European Convention the Committee of Ministers keeps non-compliance with a judgment of the European Court on the agenda until the remedy ordered has been executed. This creates a ‘psychological pressure’ to comply. In 1990 the UN Human Rights Committee created a Special Rapporteur for Follow-Up on Views. Results of the follow-up activities are published in the Committee’s annual report to the UN General Assembly. The Committee routinely requests states to submit information on measures taken to implement the views within three months. The African Commission adopted a resolution on follow-up in 2006. However, as noted above efforts by decision making bodies to monitor the implementation of their own decisions have seemingly not led to increased compliance.

The reasons for the limited use of the complaints systems seem to lie in a combination of ignorance about their existence and the lack of effective remedies provided. Currently there are very limited avenues of redress for an individual seeking redress for human rights violations at the international level in Africa. Complaints mechanisms will continue to play a role, but in the context of the current situation in Africa they cannot form the basis of the international system. As in the national systems access to justice must be seen in a wider light than access to courts.

5.6 Factors affecting compliance

5.6.1 The effect of the normative framework

When elaboration of the legal framework for accession to the APRM started in November 2002 the intention was to draft a legally binding instrument. In the drafting stages this instrument was known as the Accord.\(^{189}\) It was to enter into force after having been ratified by one state from each of the five African regions. When the accession instrument was adopted by the Implementation Committee in March 2003 it had been renamed Memorandum of Understanding and provided that it should start to be operational on the day on which the fifth AU member state had deposited the signed document with the NEPAD Secretariat.\(^{190}\)

It is unclear what caused the changed terminology from what would have been a clearly legally binding treaty to what is seemingly a ‘soft law’ instrument that is not legally binding on the participants.\(^{191}\) One possible factor is that a ratification procedure as provided for in the draft Accord would have taken time. Since the NEPAD Implementation Committee was keen on getting the process going it would have chosen a legal framework that could enter into force immediately.

\(^{191}\) On factors deciding whether states opt for soft law or hard law instruments see Goldsmith & Posner (2005) 91-100.
Though this factor might have played a role, the shift of terminology from Accord to MOU indicate that the Implementation Committee wanted a non-binding legal framework. This also explains the change of the word ‘ensure’ in the draft Accord and the APRM Base Document to the weaker ‘encourage’ in the MOU.

Memorandum of Understanding is a term normally used for bilateral agreements, with multilateral non-binding instruments often referred to as declarations.\(^{192}\) What makes the APRM MOU different from other multilateral declarations is that it includes certain provisions more often found in treaties. The reasons for this can probably be found in the drafting history of the MOU and the fact that it is a voluntary procedure and that participating countries must therefore sign up for the process.

As set out in the Vienna Convention the name of the agreement does not determine whether it is to be seen as a treaty or not.\(^{193}\) The text of the agreement must be studied to determine whether it is to be seen as a treaty, and therefore legally binding. A careful reading of the MOU and its annexures seems to suggest that the intention of the Implementation Committee in adopting the MOU has not been to create a legally binding instrument. This is also how it has been interpreted by states.\(^{194}\) Though not legally binding, the MOU is politically binding on the participating states. A violation can therefore have political consequences for the state in question.\(^{195}\)

194 For example most states provide that treaties must be ratified by parliament. It appears that only Tanzania has followed this route, and then only after the signed MOU had already been submitted to the AU. The President of Tanzania signed the MOU on 26 May 2004 and submitted it to the AU Assembly in July. The MOU was ratified by the Tanzanian Parliament in February 2005. Report for the Africa Government Forum VI (AGF VI) on preparations for the African Peer Review Mechanism (APRM) in Tanzania, 9th – 11th May 2006, Kigali, Rwanda, 1.

If consensus would emerge among the participating governments that the APRM is not needed anymore, a decision by the APRM Forum could dissolve the APRM. Amendment of the MOU is by mutual consent. If states had acceded to the APRM by way of a treaty such as the draft Accord, the APRM would have had a more stable legal basis.

The MOU on the APRM is not the first ‘soft law’ agreement to establish international institutional structures, indeed the structures established under NEPAD is another example. Among other examples can be mentioned the institutions of the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE),196 the Commonwealth Secretariat197 and the Commission on Sustainable Development,198 that monitors the implementation of Agenda 21, which all have been established through non legally binding international agreements. The same applies to the UN special procedures and the special rapporteurs of the African Commission. The lack of a treaty basis for these mechanisms has led them to monitor compliance not only with treaties but also with ‘soft’ law instruments such as declarations and resolutions.199

It has been argued that moving away from ‘hard’ to ‘soft’ law, as exemplified by the ILO Declaration on Fundamental Principles and Rights at Work, can lead to a weakening of treaty norms.200 The APRM uses a ‘soft’ approach both in setting out objectives and in the implementation process. Treaty norms remain legally binding with the APRM acting in a subsidiary role with regard to these norms, thus the importance of referring to the findings of the primary monitoring body. It is important to see the role of the monitoring of the APRM as complementary to other mechanisms. Its role is to exert additional pressure.\footnote{Cf EB Weiss ‘Conclusions: Understanding compliance with soft law’ in Dinah Shelton (ed) Commitment and compliance - The role of non-binding norms in the international legal system (2000) 536, who finds that ‘soft law instruments linked to a binding obligation were more likely to be complied with than were those not so affiliated’.

} Some have argued that whether a finding of non-compliance is binding or not does not really affect the effectiveness of the finding as ‘the various compliance procedures appear to derive their force from the ongoing interactions in which they are anchored, not from legal status.’\footnote{J Brunnée ‘Compliance control’ in G Ulfstein (ed) Making treaties work – Human rights, environment and arms control (2007) 389.}

5.6.2 Expertise and independence

The use of experts in assessing compliance has the advantage of making the assessment as objective as possible. Factors that the state parties should take into consideration when electing members to treaty bodies include: high moral standing,\footnote{ACHPR art 31, CCPR art 28(2), CERD art 8(1), CEDAW art 17(1), CRC art 43(2), CAT art 17(1).} acknowledged impartiality,\footnote{CERD art 8(1).} equitable geographical distribution,\footnote{CERD art 8(1), CEDAW art 17(1), CRC art 43(2), CAT art 17(1).} representation of principal legal systems,\footnote{CERD art 8(1), CEDAW art 17(1), CRC art 43(2).} competence in the field covered by the convention,\footnote{CEDAW art 17(1), CRC 43(2).} recognised competence in the field of human rights,\footnote{ACHPR art 31, CCPR art 28(2), CAT art 17(1).} and legal experience.\footnote{ACHPR art 31, CCPR art 28(2), CAT art 17(1).} Other factors limiting the pool of potential experts include that the positions are time consuming and not paid.

There has in the past been a tendency of appointing civil servants to the African Commission. A note verbale[^210] to all ministries of foreign affairs in AU member states in April 2005 seeking nominations to four seats on the Commission excluded senior civil servants and ambassadors. The result of the election of the new members at the AU Summit in July 2005 indicates that these guidelines were followed.^[211]

The quality of special rapporteurs and members of monitoring bodies should also be considered in determining the potential effectiveness of a monitoring mechanism. If the arguments put forward by the expert body is persuasive enough or if they are taken up by domestic media and civil society organisations they might lead to policy change. However, many times there is a need for additional political pressure to persuade a country to adopt and implement necessary reforms.

The independence of the APRM Panel is guaranteed in its Rules:

> The APR Panel is an autonomous body. Its members shall serve in their personal capacity and not as members of governments or organizations. The APR Panel shall neither seek nor receive instructions from any authority external to the APR Forum. The recommendations and decisions of the APR Panel shall be made independently, impartially, and in good faith. The APR Panel shall not be influenced by political preferences or any particular interest whatsoever.[^212]

A short background on the original members of the Panel will be given below to evaluate whether the Panel is competent in all governance areas.[^213] Professor

[^213]: This overview includes Dr Stals and Ms Savané which at the time of writing had retired from the Panel, see chapter 4.
Adebayo Adedeji (born 1930) is a Nigerian economist that until 1991 was Executive Secretary of the UN Economic Commission for Africa. Marie-Angélique Savané from Senegal is former director of the Africa division of the UN Population Fund and was a member of the Commission on Global Governance. Ambassador Bethuel Kiplagat (born 1936) is former permanent secretary of the Kenyan ministry of foreign affairs and ambassador to France and the UK. Mr Kiplagat has been involved in peace making efforts on the horn of Africa and in early January 2006 was appointed to head a committee charged with reviewing the Kenyan constitution. Dr Dorothy Njeuma (born 1943) has a PhD in zoology. She is former vice-minister for national education and currently rector of Université de Yaoundé 1. Graca Machel (born 1946) is former minister of education of Mozambique and NGO activist. Dr Chris Stals (born 1935) is former reserve bank governor of South Africa. Mohammed Seghir Babes is chairperson of the Algerian Economic and Social Council and former minister of health in the Algerian government, Regional balance has been assured, but it is unclear if all of the eight countries that had signed up for the APRM at the time of the election of the first Panel members were consulted. The fact that three out of the seven original members were women shows that the gender equity requirement has been taken seriously.

The composition of the panel is thus quite different from human rights monitoring bodies which to a large extent are made up of lawyers. However, it has been argued that a legal background is only really needed in the context of dispute settlement and that a diversity of expertise would benefit the UN human rights treaty bodies in their mandate of examining state reports.\textsuperscript{214} The overview above shows that a broad set of experiences of relevance to the APRM are represented on the Panel.\footnote{In an interview with the author Dr Stals noted that there was need for expertise in finance on the Panel in particular after his retirement. Interview with Chris Stals, Pretoria, 16 July 2009.}

Some members of the Panel have strong links with their governments, raising questions with regard to their independence. This situation is however not surprising considering the lack of transparency in the selection process. The Panel includes three former ministers (Ms Machel, Dr Njeuma and Mr Seghir Babes). It is interesting to note that Dr Njeuma is a member of the central committee of the ruling party of Cameroon.\footnote{WW Nana et al ‘Njeuma predicates Muyuka’s development on Biya’s election’ www.postnewsline.com/2004/09/strongnjeuma_pr.html#more (accessed 24 April 2006).} It is clear that she would not fulfil the criteria of independence established for election of members of the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights and the African Court on Human and Peoples’ Rights. It must however be noted that there is no indication in the first country review reports of any deference to governments on the side of the Panel.

5.6.3 Quality of the recommendations

The quality of the recommendations in the country review reports may influence whether they are implemented or not. Recommendations which are difficult to understand or not based on any analysis in the report are less likely to be included in the Programme of Action. Such recommendations may also be neglected in the implementation reports.

Jordaan has criticised the Rwanda country review report for including recommendations which are vapid, tautological, naïve, officious and obvious.\footnote{E Jordaan ‘Grist for the sceptic’s mill: Rwanda and the African Peer Review Mechanism’ (2007) 25:3 Journal of Contemporary African Studies 331-353 341.} While this is true, the same criticism could to varying degrees be levied against the other country review reports and indeed against other monitoring mechanisms, including state reporting. However, the APRM country review reports, as concluding observations of treaty monitoring bodies, also include many recommendations which are relevant, insightful and concrete.

5.6.4 Types of rights

Does the APRM have more potential in bringing about change with regard to some types of rights as opposed to others? Human rights can be divided into positive and negative rights. Civil rights are often seen as negative rights ‘restraining the State from unjustified interference’.\(^\text{218}\) In contrast socio-economic rights are seen as rights which impose a duty on the state to take action to ensure a level playing field.\(^\text{219}\) However, it is clear that socio-economic rights have a ‘negative’ component restraining the state from taking action that would violate these rights. Similarly civil rights have resource implications and therefore have a ‘positive’ component in addition to the duty of restraint.

The distinction between negative and positive elements of rights is relevant in determining the potential contribution of the APRM to the realisation of human rights. The APRM is unlikely to play a major role in redressing violations of negative rights apart from the public pressure that can be exerted through discussion of such rights in the implementation reports. Instead the potential of the APRM lies in being used as a pro-active, preventative tool which programmatically addresses positive rights through a participative process with rights-based resource allocations in the POA. This approach would use the supervised participatory process of the APRM to make the necessary choices among demands on the public purse in a rights-based manner. These clear time-bound commitments would be followed up both nationally and internationally with consequences for government officials if it could be shown that they had neglected to implement the POA.

\(^{219}\) See eg UN Declaration on the Right to Development art 8(1), ‘States … shall ensure, inter alia, equality of opportunity for all in their access to basic resources, education, health services, food, housing, employment and the fair distribution of income.’
5.6.5 Peer pressure and public pressure

Peer pressure between states is exercised bilaterally and in international organisations, both in formal and informal settings. As has been noted above the political organs of international organisations have an important role in the follow-up of decisions and recommendations of human rights monitoring bodies. The UN Commission on Human Rights was criticised for applying double standards. There is no indication that the situation has improved through its replacement by the Human Rights Council.

There is a strong movement within the UN, supported mainly by developing states, to move away from 'naming and shaming' of violating states. Social sanctions in the form of 'naming and shaming' have formed an important part of the international approach to human rights. The effectiveness of this approach is disputed by some.

The African Commission’s public sessions are the regional equivalent of the Human Rights Council’s public debates. However, political power lies not in these sessions but in the summits of the AU Assembly of Heads of State and Government to which the African Commission reports. Some commentators have been critical of the role political bodies can play in the process. Flinterman and Henderson make the following comment on the African regional human rights system:

Whatever power exists to implement the Commission’s findings seems to be vested in the OAU’s Assembly of Heads of State and Government, which as a political body, should not be trusted to put human rights above state interests.

The role the AU Assembly has under the African Charter to approve the reports of the Commission should be criticised.\textsuperscript{223} However, it is also clear that the AU could benefit from a more thorough discussion of the human rights situation in its member states at the highest level.

Even more important than peer pressure is public pressure. To achieve such pressure requires firstly an active local civil society and thus respect of freedom of expression and association. Secondly it requires access to information. Without these two key components public pressure becomes virtually impossible to achieve. It must also be noted that people who live in poverty and thus are denied their right to an adequate standard of living, rarely have the opportunity to contribute to the public debate even if they enjoy freedom of expression and freedom of association. Respect for human rights, both socio-economic and civil and political, is thus necessary to achieve one of the main factors, public pressure, which induces compliance with human rights.

International NGOs play an important role in both developing international standards and monitoring of compliance.\textsuperscript{224} Transnational NGOs can play an important role in assisting nascent local civil society.\textsuperscript{225} The combined pressure from above and below can improve the situation for local organisations and thus improve the prospects for impact through public pressure in the country.\textsuperscript{226} However, the impact may be more limited if it is true, as is sometimes asserted, that many local NGOs focusing on human rights in Africa are elite-driven ‘mechanisms for obtaining foreign funds’. 227

5.6.6 Sanctions

The different methods of monitoring that have been discussed above often result in the finding that a particular rule has not been complied with. When compliance with such a finding is not forthcoming sanctions can under certain circumstances help convince the non-compliant state to change its behaviour.

The most common form of sanctions in the African context is withdrawal of aid by donor countries often referred to as conditionality. More comprehensive economic sanctions have become increasingly controversial. It should be noted that ‘[t]he logic of sanctions – that diminishing ability to implement human rights guarantees will enhance the willingness of a government to do so – has thus far failed empirical verification.’ 228

After failures such as Iraq where economic sanctions had disastrous consequences for the general population, violating their socio-economic rights, the focus has shifted to ‘smart’ sanctions which ‘have a high probability of directly hurting those responsible for the targeted policies while sparing the general population’. 229 The UN Security Council adopted mandatory sanctions only twice before 1990: against Rhodesia and South Africa. 230 In the 1990’s the number of sanctions regimes increased dramatically and by 2003 another 13 countries had been subjected to mandatory sanctions regimes by the Security Council, most commonly an arms embargo. Of these countries, nine were in Africa.\(^\text{231}\) As of July 2009 the UN Security Council had various sanctions in place against six African countries: Côte d’Ivoire, Democratic Republic of the Congo, Liberia, Sierra Leone, Somalia and Sudan.\(^\text{232}\)

The APRM MOU does not include any equivalent to the last paragraph of the CSSDCA MOU which provides that ‘We commit ourselves to respect and implement all the above undertakings in conformity with Articles 9(e) and 23(2) of the Constitutive Act of the African Union.’ Article 23(2) of the Constitutive Act provides that the Assembly can decide on sanctions of a ‘political and economic nature’ against a state that fails to comply with decisions or policies of the AU. Suspension of participation in the work of the organisation as a sanction has been used quite extensively by the AU with regard to membership dues arrears and as a response to military coups.\(^\text{233}\)

Article 23(2) is not directly applicable to the recommendations of the APRM Panel. However, the APRM Base Document provides that the APRM Forum ‘may wish to put the Government on notice of their intention to proceed with appropriate measures by a given date’ against a state which does not show the ‘necessary political will’ to ‘rectify identified shortcomings’.\(^\text{234}\) It should be noticed that the Forum’s power to take such action is discretionary. Any decision on sanctions by the Forum in terms of the APRM Base Document

\(^{234}\) APRM Base Document para 24.
would need the endorsement of the AU Assembly in terms of article 23(2) of the Constitutive Act.

It seems unlikely that the Forum would seek to impose sanctions against a country which does not implement the recommendations in the country review report or does not implement the POA. Firstly, international organisations are generally reluctant to impose sanctions.\(^{235}\) Secondly, as has been noted in chapter 4, the participating heads of state and government have not taken a critical approach in examining the reports presented to the Forum. Participating governments have emphasised that the process is an assisted self-assessment.

5.6.7 Aid and capacity building

When discussing the potential effectiveness of the APRM it is also necessary to examine the implication of ‘positive sanctions’. Donor countries have repeatedly stated that the outcome of the reviews should be taken into consideration when deciding about aid allocations.\(^{236}\) The link to aid thus exists in relation to both ‘negative’ and ‘positive’ sanctions. Such links are nothing new; Shivji sees the need for African states to prove their ‘aid-worthiness’ as one of the contributing factors to the drafting of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights.\(^{237}\)

Aid conditional on adoption of specific economic policies was a mainstay of structural adjustment from the 1970’s followed by good governance conditionality from the end of the cold war.\(^{238}\) Donor conditionality can take different forms: no or less aid to those who do not follow conditions decided by the donors or rewards to those the donors consider have good policies. Human rights conditionality can also be used to redistribute aid between sectors within the country to improve human rights.\footnote{239} In the latter case it must be noted that sectoral reallocation can open up resources for the government which it would otherwise not have.\footnote{240}

With conditionality a government is no longer accountable to its citizens but to donors. According to Tomasevski ‘the use of “human rights” to legitimize external policing and sanctioning undermines the very basis for human rights protection, which ought to be domestic.’\footnote{241} Sanctions, for example in the form of withdrawal of aid, can have serious consequences for the population of a country. To again quote Tomasevski: ‘in trying to punish “a state” sanctions necessarily victimize its population and result in double victimization. The human rights rationale should accord priority to the victim.’\footnote{242}

To protect rights takes commitment but also requires resources. This applies to both civil and political rights and socio-economic rights.\footnote{243} Many African states might use their available resources for the wrong things,\footnote{244} but there is no denying that there is also a substantial resource gap. It is clear that this gap in the long term needs to be filled in other ways than aid. However, for the time being aid is still needed and may be effective if used in the right way. The APRM has the potential of providing a holistic framework for using aid as effectively as possible. However, there are still many problems as will be illustrated in the case studies on Ghana, Rwanda and Kenya in the following chapters.

A donor industry has developed around technical assistance aimed at filling existing or perceived gaps in the knowledge of the recipient country bureaucracy.\textsuperscript{245} However, it is generally recognised that ‘challenges of building state capacity are at least as political as they are technical’.\textsuperscript{246} There is therefore a need to build the capacity of accountability structures.\textsuperscript{247} According to Levy this requires ‘understanding country-specific constitutional structures and patterns of political, social, and economic interests and to aim for a good fit between efforts to strengthen administrative and accountability systems and these country-specific realities’.\textsuperscript{248} Arguably, the country itself through participatory processes such as the APRM is better positioned than donors to find this ‘good fit’. External expertise may be needed in some circumstances but this should be provided at the request of the developing country and not be imposed as part of an aid package.\textsuperscript{249}

Assistance to improve public expenditure management is often seen as particularly important as it will lead to increased accountability on the use of public resource. A second reason for a focus on public expenditure management is that better capacity in this area would increase donors’ willingness to provide budget support rather than project financing which would increase ‘country ownership’.\textsuperscript{250}

Cassel states that international human rights law is ‘one strand in the rope that pulls rights forward’, with the central strand being global growth in human rights consciousness.\(^\text{251}\)

Martin Scheinin has noted that the state reporting system to the UN Human Rights Committee functions well in respect of those States parties that wish to co-operate with the Committee in good faith. In general, they may not be the most problematic countries in respect of human rights violations. Nevertheless, in all countries, there is room for continuous improvement in the implementation of the Covenant, and the reporting procedure provides for an opportunity for regular review and feedback on the international level. This is highly conducive to a national discourse and the development of a culture of human rights in respective countries.\(^\text{252}\)

Much the same can be said about the APRM. It is in countries that are committed to reform that the APRM can have its biggest impact. As with state reporting and individual complaints, the impact of the APRM in conflict-ridden countries with grave human rights violations is likely to be minor. In such cases direct action at the political level is necessary. In such scenarios special procedures and field presences are more likely to play a significant role in for example conducting independent fact-finding which can form the basis for action at the political level.

The various monitoring methods discussed above, good as they may be in obtaining reliable information, must also be linked to political leverage. Political involvement in human rights, such as through the now defunct UN Human Rights Commission is often seen as selective in that powerful states avoid criticism. However, the fact that some countries avoid criticism should not be seen as an excuse to doing nothing. To what extent the new Universal Periodic Review of the UN Human Rights Council will address these concerns remain to be seen. History has shown that leverages such as sanctions and military intervention must be used with extreme caution.

Christian Tams has noted that ‘systemic enforcement’, the system for enforcement established under an international instrument, is particularly weak with regard to human rights treaties. He argues that this may explain the many efforts to ‘non-systemic’ enforcement in this field, for example UN resolutions, sanctions and the ‘humanization’ of cooperation agreements.\textsuperscript{253}

The APRM is non-systemic in its application of standards and codes. The focus of the APRM is both on monitoring and enforcement. With regard to monitoring, the question is whether the APRM raises issues not already raised by a multitude of other mechanisms. The case studies in part II of this thesis will attempt a partial answer to that question.

Tams notes with regard to human rights that ‘the demand for non-systemic enforcement is considerable.’\textsuperscript{254} The APRM plays a role in enforcement through addressing the identified shortcomings. To what extent the enforcement aspect of the APRM, the development and monitoring of the Programme of Action, has been effective will be investigated in the case studies. This aspect is very important as the Programme of Action to a large extent is what sets the APRM apart from other monitoring.

One of the prominent attributes of the APRM is the manner in which it brings together international and domestic monitoring. International monitoring can help strengthen domestic human rights institutions in a number of ways. International human rights law provides a common language, reinforces universality, legitimises claims, signal will of the international community; gives judicial precision and expectation of compliance, encourages enforcement and creates stigma for violators.\footnote{Cassel (2001).}

Though this chapter has been focusing on the role of international institutions, it must be emphasised that national watch dog institutions, civil society organisations and the media play an even more important role in inducing compliance with human rights norms. The APRM Panel of Eminent Persons has noted: ‘Existing national oversight institutions should be an integral part of the national preparation for and participation in the APRM’.\footnote{Guidelines for countries to prepare for and to participate in the African Peer Review Mechanism (APRM) para 37.} The same should apply to international monitoring. Greater reliance should be given to their findings both at the national and international level in the APRM process. At the same time international human rights monitoring bodies should where applicable take note of APRM findings. It is through the combined effect of different types of monitoring, at the domestic and international level, that an effective human rights system can be established.
PART II

CASE STUDIES
Introduction

The following chapters discuss the first reviews country by country setting out findings in the country review reports and actions in the Programme of Action (POA), in the context of what international and national human rights monitoring bodies and civil society organisations have had to say about the human rights situation in the country. The progress reports of the reviewed countries and other material are used to see to what extent human rights relevant commitments in the POA have actually been realised.

For each case study the introduction presents national plans of action which are of relevance to a discussion of the APRM, in particular poverty reduction strategies. Thereafter an overview of the adherence of the country to international human rights treaties and cooperation with international monitoring bodies is discussed with a focus on to what extent the APRM considered this issue. The outcome of interaction with the monitoring bodies, for example concluding observations of treaty monitoring bodies, are further considered under the headings of specific human rights issues set out in the order in which they are treated in the African Charter on Human and Peoples’ Rights, the main African human rights treaty which has been ratified by all the member states of the African Union.¹

GHANA

6.1 Introduction

The Ghana self-assessment was conducted between May 2004 and March 2005. The country review mission took place in April 2005. A final POA was submitted in May 2005 ahead of the presentation of the report to the APRM Forum in June the same year. The country review report has been translated into ‘easy to read English’ as well as six major local languages. Ghana has submitted annual reports on progress on implementation of the POA. Monitoring of implementation of the POA remains in the hand of the Governing Council which is assisted by the technical research institutes which contributed to the self-assessment and district oversight committees.

6.2 Linkages with other national plans

5 Budget 2009 paras 883, 889, 890.

Reduction Strategy (GPRS II) (2006-2009) was adopted in November 2005. GPRS II calls for ‘a holistic and participatory approach’ to monitoring and evaluation ‘including consultative mechanisms such as the APRM’. The National Development Planning Commission publishes annual progress reports on the implementation of GPRS II. The policy formulations of GPRS II and the APRM POA are generally in line with each other and GPRS II makes cross references to APRM objectives. To the extent that there are different policy prescriptions in areas of relevance for human rights, these will be discussed below.

Ghana does not have a national action plan for human rights.

6.3 Financing

The cost for implementing the APRM POA (2005-2008) is set at US$ 5.5 billion, of which $ 2.4 billion is for corporate governance and $ 2.85 billion is for socio-economic development. The 2007 progress report indicates that US $ 433 million was released from the national budget for APRM related activities in 2006 and US $ 751 million in 2007. The discrepancies between the different governance areas are much smaller in these actual disbursements than in the POA. US$ 163.5 million was provisionally released in 2006 and 2007 for activities related to democracy and political governance, US$ 355 million for economic governance, US $ 367.4 million for corporate governance and US$ 462.2 million for socio-economic development.

8 GPRS II xxix, 72.
While the largest portion of the funds released is allocated to socio-economic development the disbursements for 2006-2007 come to only 16% of the US$ 2.85 billion required for 2005-2008 according to the APRM POA. On the other hand the disbursements in 2006 and 2007 for democracy and political governance, and economic governance exceed the projected costs in the APRM POA for 2005-2008. The implementation matrix at the end of the progress report does not provide information on what has been spent on the individual action points.

The total cost for implementing GPRS II is set at US$ 8.06 billion. US$ 6.27 billion is budgeted through the MTEF (2006-2009).12 A separate document sets out the details about the projected costs per objective.13 GPRS II rather than the POA forms the basis for support by donors.14 However, some donors have made reference to the APRM when pledging to support Ghana.15 Some donor funding take the form of budget support.16

The 2008 budget of Ghana projected expenditure of GHS 7 billion (US$ 7.3 billion). The outcome was more than GHS 9 billion.17 Domestic revenue in 2008 was GHS 4.8 billion (budget 4.76 billion).18 Project and programme grants from donors were GHS 820.8 million (budgeted GHS 853.4 million) and loans GHS 668.2 million (budget GHS 621.5 million).19 In June 2009, the World Bank committed to support Ghana with a US$ 535 million concessionary loan, part of a three-year support totaling US$ 1.2 billion.20

The figures above illustrate Ghana’s reliance on foreign aid. When the APRM Forum in January 2009 considered Ghana’s progress report for 2008 it was agreed that the country’s dependence on foreign aid should be investigated further.\textsuperscript{21} However, it is clear that such dependency might be difficult to get out of, in particular given the current economic situation. In his 2009 budget statement the Minister of Finance noted that:\textsuperscript{22}

Weak demand for exports and weak commodity prices imply less export revenue. In addition, expected shortfalls in remittances, a slowdown in donor support and private capital inflows as a result of the global recession are all likely to have negative impact on the Ghanaian economy in general and on public finances in particular.

6.4 Adherence to international human rights standards and cooperation with international monitoring bodies

\textit{Ratification of international human rights instruments}

The Ghana APRM report in its summary of the self-assessment notes a number of UN conventions of relevance to the protection of human rights which have not been ratified by Ghana.\textsuperscript{23} However, the recommendations in the country review report only refer to the need for Ghana to adopt a ‘binding time-frame’ to ratify a number of AU instruments which according to the report has not been ratified by Ghana.\textsuperscript{24}

\end{itemize}
The POA includes a commitment to ratify the AU instruments listed in the recommendations by 2007. Of the listed instruments the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child was ratified by Ghana in 2005. Ghana’s progress report for 2007 notes that four of the remaining seven instruments included in the recommendations and POA had been ratified by the end of 2007: the amendments to the AU Constitutive Act, the Defence Pact, the Women’s Protocol and the Corruption Convention. The Protocol on the African Human Rights Court should not have been included in the country review report as an un-ratified instrument as it was ratified in August 2004. The progress report continues this mistake by listing the Protocol as not having been ratified by the end of 2007.

In its progress reports, the Governing Council should also consider conventions that have been adopted after the review process but which are of relevance to the improvement of governance and advocate for their ratification. These include the African Youth Charter and the AU Charter on Democracy, Elections and Governance. However, the main problem with regard to follow-up is that non-ratified UN instruments were not included in the recommendations in the country review report, with the exception of the optional protocols to the CRC which were dealt with under the issue of children’s rights. None of the un-ratified UN instruments were taken up in the POA and consequently not considered in the progress reports. The Second Optional Protocol to ICCPR, dealing with the abolition of the death penalty, was not even mentioned in the country review report despite the Commission on Human Rights and Administrative Justice (CHRAJ) calling for its ratification in its

26 Ghana APRM progress report 2007 24. The mistakes with regard to the status of international treaties are not only evident in the APRM process. Several mistakes are also evident in Ghana’s report to the UN UPR. See National report submitted in accordance with paragraph 15(A) of the annex to Human Rights Council resolution 5/1, Ghana, A/HRC/WG.6/2/GHA/1, 8 April 2008, 7. (Hereafter National report)
27 CRR Ghana ch 2 para 105.
None of the optional protocols to CEDAW, CAT and CRC had been ratified by July 2009 despite the signature of Ghana to all the protocols indicating its intention to ratify, with the signature of the CEDAW optional protocol dating back to 2000. CHRAJ again called for the ratification of these instruments in its submission to the 2008 Universal Periodic Review of Ghana.29

The country review report takes note that Ghana has not ratified ILO Convention 138 on minimum age, which is one of the eight fundamental ILO Conventions.30 The Convention had not been ratified by July 2009.

State reporting

The recommendations in the country review report call on Ghana to ‘clear outstanding arrears’ with respect to reporting obligations under human rights treaties.31 The POA indicates that this should be done by 2007.32 The 2007 Ghana progress report makes no mention of actions taken to improve state reporting. A survey of available information indicates that the problem with late or no reporting remains. Ghana had by July 2009 not submitted state reports as required under the ICESCR, ICCPR, CAT and CMW. A consolidated report on CERD was submitted in June 2002 and considered by the Committee in March 2003. A consolidated report on CEDAW was submitted in 2005 and examined by the Committee in August 2006. Its second report on the CRC due in 1997 was submitted in March 2004 and considered by the Committee in January 2006. Ghana has submitted two reports to the African Commission, the latest in March 2000 which was considered in April 2001.

Other cooperation with international human rights bodies

Ghana has issued a standing invitation to UN special procedures. So far the only visit to Ghana by a UN special procedure was the mission by the Special Rapporteur on violence against women in July 2007.\(^{33}\) Ghana was considered by the Universal Periodic Review of the UN Human Rights Council in May 2008.\(^{34}\)

6.5 Compliance with substantive human rights norms

Equality and non-discrimination

The APRM country review report notes with regard to gender discrimination that '[i]t must be emphasised that there is no lack of political will to address this problem, and the Constitution clearly commits the country to the elimination of gender discrimination.'\(^{35}\) However, it must be noted that the provision on equality and freedom from discrimination in the Ghana Constitution allows Parliament to adopt discriminatory laws in the field of personal law.\(^{36}\) The African Commission noted in its 2001 concluding observations on the Ghana periodic report:\(^{37}\)

Article 270 of the Ghanaian Constitution which guarantees and insulates the institution of traditional village authorities from any control, is tantamount to institutionalizing the practices of banning pregnant teenagers and people suspected of witchcraft, and as such the government of Ghana should endeavour to abolish this harmful practice. This article should be amended to enable government to address this issue and eradicate this obnoxious practice.

\(^{34}\) The Ghana state report to the UPR uses the APRM country review report as support for a number of statements, see National report, fn 2, 7 and 8.

\(^{35}\) CRR Ghana ch 6 para 7.

While not discussing the constitutional provisions the country review report discussed the issue of chieftaincy extensively and recommended that the government should ‘review the institution of chieftaincy to make it more responsive to the needs and demands of the rapidly changing Ghanaian society, and to the aspirations of people across the gender divide.’\textsuperscript{38} This recommendation is not taken up in the POA. However, the 2007 progress report notes that:

A Ministry of Chieftaincy and Cultural Affairs has been established to deal with chieftaincy issues. In addition, a Royal College is to be established to train chiefs and potential chiefs in socio-economic development and conflict prevention and resolution issues. The import is to make chieftaincy more responsive to the developmental concerns of the constituents.\textsuperscript{39}

The progress report also notes that some stakeholders, in particular queen mothers, have argued that the Chieftaincy Act should be amended to allow women in the Houses of Chiefs.\textsuperscript{40} A pilot project is currently underway to codify customary law in relation to land and family.\textsuperscript{41} This project follows the finding in the progress report that the National House of Chiefs has not fulfilled its role in codifying customary law in a way that would abolish harmful traditional practices.\textsuperscript{42}

Harmful traditional practices with a gender element in Ghana include the servitude of girls in traditional temples (\textit{trokosi}), persecution of alleged witches and female genital mutilation (FGM). The self-assessment report notes that the Commission on Human Rights and Administrative Justice has taken action to address violations arising from traditional practices such as \textit{trokosi}, female circumcision and ‘penal colonies for alleged witches’.\textsuperscript{43} Despite a law outlawing the practice in 1998 no one has ever been prosecuted for \textit{trokosi}.\textsuperscript{44} It is debatable whether criminal prohibition is effective to deter the practice and it has been argued that the 1998 law might have had a counter-productive effect on initiatives to curb trokosi through cultural-sensitive education and assistance.\(^{45}\) The POA to some extent recognises this dilemma in that in addition to the ‘enforcement of existing legislation it provides for awareness campaigns to secure the release and rehabilitate victims of ‘ritual servitude’ and ‘[d]ecline abuses against witches’\(^{46}\). The 2007 progress report notes that witch camps have been ‘depopulated’ and that the incidence of ‘customary servitude’ (trokosi) has declined after ‘intense educational and advocacy campaigns.’\(^{47}\) However, a detailed analysis of the issue by the UN Special Rapporteur on violence against women shows that much remains to be done to eradicate these practices.\(^{48}\)

A Domestic Violence Act was adopted in 2007.\(^{49}\) This follows recommendations in the country review report,\(^{50}\) which were included in the POA.\(^{51}\) A number of measures have been taken to make the Domestic Violence Act effective.\(^{52}\) One controversial issue with regard to the Act was the issue of marital rape. The CEDAW Committee in 2006 called for the repeal of section 42(g) of the Criminal Code which provides that a husband cannot be prosecuted for the rape of his wife.\(^{53}\) The Ghana progress report notes that the Domestic Violence Bill included a prohibition on marital rape, but that this provision was removed in the Act due to public pressure.\(^{54}\)

The country review report notes that there ‘are no specific laws in Ghana on the political rights and participation of women, although Article 9 of the African Charter’s protocol obliges State parties to ensure equal participation of women in political life through affirmative action and enabling legislation. The country review mission is seemingly ahead of its time when it bases the obligation to adopt legislation based on a Protocol that was only ratified by Ghana in 2007.

As noted in the country review report the problem is often not so much with policy as with implementation. The report states that the goals of the Affirmative Action Policy of 1998 have not been realised. There is no explanation in the report as to why the 1998 policy did not succeed. The Panel calls on Ghana to adopt a 40% quota for women in public offices. This was the same goal that was set in the 1998 Policy. The Policy further provided that 50% of government appointees to District Assemblies should be women.

Discrimination is rampant in the work place. The recommendations in the country review report calls on the government, the private sector and 'other relevant entities to '[a]ddress stereotyping of women and gender discrimination in the workplace'. The government is called upon to 'promote affirmative action ... in public institutions and in the organised private sector' and establish benchmarks of progress in achieving gender equality and to sanction institutions which do not fulfil the benchmarks in time'. While there is recognition that affirmative action is called for also in the private sector, there is no call for specific measures with regard to women in the informal sector, as called for by the CEDAW Committee, with the exception of adolescent domestic workers.

The POA includes monitoring, evaluation and review of the Affirmative Action Policy and the creation of schemes to increase participation of women in public life.\textsuperscript{64} It further provides that policies should be developed to make it easier for women to participate in politics.\textsuperscript{65} GPRS II simply calls for the progressive implementation of affirmative action for women to enhance their access ‘to economic resources and promote women in public life’.\textsuperscript{66}

The CEDAW Committee noted in its concluding observations the lack of gender specific statistical data.\textsuperscript{67} The POA provides for more resources to the Ghana Statistical Service to provide gender disaggregated data.\textsuperscript{68} GPRS II provides a number of actions to improve statistical information.\textsuperscript{69} Accurate statistics is important to make another goal of GPRS II possible, namely that gender analysis should inform the budget.\textsuperscript{70}

There are a number of issues with regard to gender discrimination that have been raised by human rights monitors but which are not reflected in the country review report, POA or GPRS II. For example, the CEDAW Committee notes that the prohibition of discrimination in the Ghanaian Constitution is not consistent with CEDAW.\textsuperscript{71} The CEDAW Committee and the Special Rapporteur call for the establishment of more shelters for victims of violence.\textsuperscript{72} The CEDAW Committee urged Ghana to amend provisions in the Constitution and the Citizenship Act which makes it more difficult for spouses of Ghanaian women than spouse of Ghanaian men to become Ghanaian citizens.\textsuperscript{73}

In addition to gender inequality there is major inequality between different regions in Ghana. In particular the northern part of the country has been neglected.

_Life_

Ghana is on track to achieve many of the MDG targets. While the country is yet to achieve sufficient reduction in child mortality to meet the MDG target, UNICEF has indicated that ‘determinants’ of child mortality are improving, for example reduction of malnutrition and treatment of malaria. ⁷⁴ There are no current statistics on maternal mortality rates, but UNICEF notes that there is ‘a common view among government and development partners that accelerated efforts are required to ensure progress, particularly through investments in skilled birth attendance and emergency obstetric care.’ ⁷⁵ The APRM self-assessment notes the challenge of meeting the MDG goals with regard to child and maternal mortality, ⁷⁶ but no solutions are proposed in the report or in the POA. However, there are actions in the POA with regard to factors which increase child mortality such as malaria. ⁷⁷ The issue of child and maternal mortality is also insufficiently dealt with in GPRS II.

There have been allegations of violations of small scale mining operators, _galamsey_, by private security companies, working for multinational mining companies, assisted by state security forces. ⁷⁸ Extra-judicial killings are alleged to have taken place and many people have lost their livelihoods. This problem has increased in recent years and while it is not dealt with in the country review report, the 2007 progress report gives ample coverage to allegations of the Wassa Association of Communities Affected by Mining (WACAM). ⁷⁹

Some forms of slavery and forced labour are a result of harmful traditional practices, such as trokosi. This practice has been discussed above as it has a clear gender dimension. Poverty forms the basis of much other exploitation in the form of forced labour and trafficking. The Protocol to Prevent, Suppress and Punish Trafficking in Persons, especially Women and Children (the Palermo Protocol) has not been ratified by Ghana, despite a recommendation to this effect in the country review report, and in the concluding observations of the CRC Committee in 2006. The POA calls for the adoption of the Human Trafficking Bill. A Human Trafficking Act was enacted in 2005. A National Plan of Action on Human Trafficking was adopted in December 2007. The POA treats the issue of child trafficking together with child labour and provide for ‘Equipping Security agencies and civil society groups to promote enforcement and compliance’. GPRS II calls for the establishment of ‘anti-trafficking clubs in schools in sending areas’, public education and reduction of poverty to stem trafficking. The APRM 2007 progress report notes the impact of initiatives with regard to child trafficking.

Torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

Police brutality has been noted as a significant problem in Ghana. The 2005 Annual Report of CHRAJ notes a number of problems with regard to detention including overcrowding, in particular in remand prisons, inadequate food and poor medical 89 CHRAJ also noted serious overcrowding at the Accra Psychiatric Hospital, CHRAJ annual report 2005 89.

CHRAJ has called for ‘periodic visits to police cells and prisons, particularly remand prisons, by cross-sections of the legislature and the judiciary as a demonstration of their commitment to uphold the fundamental human rights of all’. The issue is not dealt with in the country review report. GPRS II only provides for the establishment of programmes to rehabilitate and reform prisoners.

Personal liberty and security

The focus in POA and GPRS II is on institutional capacity to ensure crime prevention. This is important, in particular in a situation where vigilante justice has been growing as a response to the perceived inefficiency of the police and the court system.

The right to personal liberty and security is violated not only by vigilantes but also by the police. In its 2005 Annual Report CHRAJ expressed concern over detention of criminal suspects in inadequate police cells beyond 48 hours. Illegal detention also takes place outside the criminal justice system. In the same report CHRAJ noted allegations of detention in the hospital of patients which could not pay their hospital bills. Issues concerning illegal detention are not addressed in the APRM report.

Two main factors contribute to the lack of access to justice: The high costs of legal advice and representation and the lack of easily accessible courts in many areas of the country. The Ghana self-assessment notes that access to justice is effectively denied a large portion of the population because of poverty. The Panel recommends that Ghana creates new courts of appeal to ease congestion and take measures to reduce the backlog of cases. The POA provides for ‘increased capacity of legal sector to provide affordable and speedy access to justice’. Proposed actions include court modernisation, more resources to legal aid, review of ‘existing costs, rules and procedures’, all to be achieved by 2005. The 2007 APRM progress report indicates that district courts have been refurbished, high courts computerised and alternative dispute resolution promoted. The report further notes that almost half of the respondents in a survey felt that access to justice had improved over the last years.

The right to information is guaranteed in article 21(1)(f) of the Constitution. A right to information bill was drafted in 2002 but has not yet been passed by Parliament. The recommendations in the country review report includes that the bill should be passed as soon as possible. The POA sets 2006 as the deadline for passing the bill under two headings, and 2007 in another. The need to enact the bill is noted in the 2007 APRM progress report, but no reference is made to that the deadlines set out in the POA had by then already passed. However, the Whistleblower’s Protection Act has been passed into law as called for in the country review report.

Political participation

The country review report notes that while consultations take place, recommendations are often ignored. The 2007 progress report states that

With regard to elections ethnic voting pattern is seen as a problem. The report also notes a lack of democratic decision making within political parties.\textsuperscript{110}

\textbf{Property}

The country review report calls on Ghana to implement proposals for a comprehensive land law ‘bearing in mind the needs of vulnerable groups, especially women’.\textsuperscript{111} The 2007 progress report notes that a draft National Land Use Plan to demarcate disputed land has been developed and is undergoing stakeholder validation.\textsuperscript{112} Initiatives to make land registration easier have also been implemented and draft legislation on land administration has been submitted to cabinet.\textsuperscript{113}

According to the self-assessment ‘relevant stakeholders feel that policy-making for ... employment creation is receiving sufficient attention and making good progress.’\textsuperscript{114} An important factor noted in the country review report is that labour statistics are lacking.\textsuperscript{115} The report states that employees are poorly protected in particular in smaller enterprises and in the informal sector and that low wages in the public sector leads to poor morale affecting service delivery.\textsuperscript{116} The report in particular notes youth unemployment as a matter of concern.\textsuperscript{117} The POA sets out that private sector development which would lead to increased employment should be encouraged through macroeconomic reforms, reduction of costs of doing business (including tax incentives) and improved infrastructure.\textsuperscript{118} No mention is made of the issue of youth employment in the POA. However, a National Youth Employment Programme was launched in October 2006.\textsuperscript{119} By August 2007, over 100 000 youth had benefited from employment through the programme.\textsuperscript{120}

The ILO criticised GPRS I for a lack of focus on employment creation and the informal economy:\textsuperscript{121}

Despite the inclusion of an employment chapter, there is no focus on employment targets. Moreover, the strategy takes a fairly narrow and sectoral view of employment, seeing job creation in agriculture and industry as a by-product of economic growth. Employment is not consistently considered as a means to improve access to income and lower poverty rates. In particular, there is not enough attention given to the growth and employment potential of the informal economy. As a result, the constraints and obstacles faced by people in informal employment are not addressed.

According to the ILO, GPRS II, adopted in November 2005, addressed most of the concerns.\textsuperscript{122}

Health

In its annual report for 2005, CHRAJ called on the government ‘to take immediate and decisive measures to address the brain drain in the health sector and improve the conditions of service of health personnel. The Commission again urged the government to accelerate the implementation of the National Health Insurance Scheme and the National Ambulance Service.’\(^{123}\) It called on the management of health institutions to promote the Patients Charter which was developed by CHRAJ and the Ghana Medical and Dental Council in 2003.\(^{124}\)

The Ghana self-assessment noted that the right to health in the Constitution has been ‘concretely manifested’ through the National Health Insurance Scheme which was established in 2003.\(^{125}\) However, the report noted that ‘the health system continues to suffer from an exodus of health personnel.’\(^{126}\) The recommendations in the country review report include the provision of incentives for health professionals to work in disadvantaged areas of the country.\(^{127}\) US$ 400 000 is the estimated budget in the POA to provide for incentives to health professionals to keep them in the country.\(^{128}\) The POA also includes initiatives to reverse the spread of HIV and AIDS and combating malaria and other communicable diseases.\(^{129}\)

The 2007 progress report takes note of the incentives introduced to keep health professionals in the country and to have them work in disadvantaged areas of the country. 75% of survey respondents think that access to health services have improved. Initiatives not included in the POA include increased training of health workers with almost four times as many health workers trained in 2007 as compared to 2003. The progress report further notes initiatives undertaken with regard to HIV and AIDS, malaria, TB, and guinea worm.

The POA includes activities with regard to ‘maintenance and rehabilitation of existing pipe network and treatment plants’. In addition US$ 12 million is allocated in the POA to extend water supply and US$ 3 million for improved sanitation. A number of projects to improve water supply are listed in the 2007 progress report. An increased number of people had also access to adequate sanitation facilities. A National Water Policy has been submitted to cabinet.

A five-year Urban Water Supply Project was initiated in January 2005 assisted by a US$ 103 million loan. The loan was conditioned on the privatisation of the previously state-owned Ghana Water Company.

Education

The CHRAJ annual report for 2005 noted that:

Universal basic education will only be achieved if schooling is made genuinely free and accessible not only in terms of basic user fees but also in respect of parent-teacher association (PTA) fees, extra tuition fees, exam fees, transportation to and from school and other related costs which are likely to restrict access, particularly for poorer communities.

The right to free and compulsory basic education is guaranteed in the Ghanaian constitution. However, the Panel notes that ‘several stakeholders across the country in the regions visited complained about the high cost of education, including basic education, which renders education unavailable to many.’ Concern about deteriorating quality was also raised. The report further takes note of the sharp increase in public expenditure on education in recent years, but states that ‘although many schools have been built in the last few years, this development has not been matched by the recruitment of sufficient numbers of teachers.’ It is unlikely that Ghana will meet the MDG on education. The report makes reference to the 1995-2005 strategic plan for Free Compulsory Universal Basic Education, but does not evaluate why it has not achieved its goal. The Panel recommended the government to ‘[a]dopt a policy designed to enforce the international law of free and compulsory basic education.’ The POA sets out actions costing US$ 82 million for the period 2005-2015 in order to achieve ‘progress towards full enrolment’. The problem with quality of education is addressed in the POA by providing for the training of more teachers and higher teacher wages.

The 2007 progress report notes that ‘[p]rimary school enrolment has increased from 2.5 million pupils in 2001/02 to almost 3.4 million in 2006/07 registering an increase of 35 percent.’ Almost half a million school children benefit from the school feeding programme. However, it has been estimated that 1 357 000 Ghanaian children did not attend school at the end of 2006.

Housing

The POA includes provisions for ‘Review of Housing policy to benefit the poor, public private partnership to provide affordable housing’. The estimated budget is set at US$ 180 million. In addition the POA lists measures to increase access to finance.\textsuperscript{148} The 2007 progress report notes the construction of close to 3000 flats and the dissatisfaction of people surveyed with access to housing and the quality of rental housing available.\textsuperscript{149} There is no examination of whether the newly constructed flats are affordable for the poor and how the number of flats constructed relates to any goal set by the government. There is no reference in the progress report to the need of a review of the housing policy.\textsuperscript{150} There is no national evictions policy in Ghana and hundreds of Ghanaians have been displaced through forced evictions.\textsuperscript{151} This issue is not dealt with in the country review report.

6.6 Protection of vulnerable groups

The Ghana self-assessment defines vulnerable groups as ‘ethnic minorities, refugees, migrant workers, the aged, disabled persons, people with HIV/AIDS and children orphaned by HIV/AIDS.’\textsuperscript{152} The Panel recommends that the international community should assist Ghana in dealing with the refugee situation. It further recommends Ghana to review capacities to cater for internally displaced persons (IDPs). Both recommendations seem a bit out of place as they are not based on any analysis in the report.\textsuperscript{153} As a result, they are disregarded in the POA, which instead provides for measures to ensure access to public facilities for the disabled, revision of the pension scheme, provision of a national policy on the aged and a review of the Ghana Refugee Board.

The rights of children are treated separately in the APRM framework from other vulnerable groups. CHRAJ noticed in its Annual Report for 2005 that many complaints to the Commission are family related and that there should be ‘intense public education on children’[s] rights, parental responsibility and the Children’s Act targeted at parents’. This need is not reflected in the APRM report or POA.

An action plan to assist street children and vulnerable youth has been developed in accordance with the POA. The 2007 follow up report notes one measure taken to solve the problem of street children, the National Youth Employment Programme (NYEP). However, NYEP can only employ youth over 15 years old.

The Special Rapporteur on violence against women stated in her report to the Human Rights Council after her mission to Ghana in July 2007:

> High levels of poverty and the external debt burden limit the Government’s margin of operation to prioritize the allocation of sufficient resources for universal basic education, gender parity in education and the economic and social development of marginalized regions and districts. The international community has a responsibility to support the Government’s efforts to promote gender equality and eliminate violence against women through targeted funding and technical cooperation, further debt relief and, perhaps most importantly, fairer terms of trade.

The APRM process does not address issues of unfair trade. Regional integration is the only trade related concern explicitly addressed. The 2007 progress report takes note of the interim Economic Partnership Agreement (EPA) with the European Union.

which was concluded in December 2007. According to the EPA, Ghana will have to dismantle its tariffs on 80% of its imports from the EU over a 15-year period.\textsuperscript{156} The advantages and disadvantages of the EPA are not discussed in the progress report.

\textit{Environment}

With regard to the rights of persons living in mining communities CHRAJ noticed in its 2005 Annual Report that:\textsuperscript{157}

\begin{quote}
Article 21(k) of the 1992 Constitution imposes a duty on the government and every Ghanaian to protect and safeguard the environment. The Commission was distressed by reports of activities that deprive communities of their livelihood, pollute water bodies and the environment, and disrupt the way of life of persons in those communities. The Commission earnestly appeals to the appropriate regulatory authorities to take the necessary action to address the problems posed by mining and protect the rights of the people living in those communities. The Commission will be happy to assist in finding appropriate solutions to the problem.
\end{quote}

The issue is not addressed in the country review report and GPRS II only calls for the vague strategy of harmonisation of 'the relationship between the mining companies and mining communities'.\textsuperscript{158}

\textbf{6.8 Human rights education}

The country review report notes that human rights features in the training of security services.\textsuperscript{159} However, as it is clearly not sufficient the country review report recommends the government to '[f]acilitate reforms in the police and other security services, so as to position them more clearly with regard to complying with basic commitments on human rights.\textsuperscript{160} This vague recommendation is not taken up in the POA. Both the POA and GPRS II focus on increased institutional capacity.\textsuperscript{161} GPRS II provides for ‘public education and dissemination of information on rights’, but not specifically targeted to the police and security services.\textsuperscript{162}

The National Commission for Civic Education and the Commission on Human Rights and Administrative Justice (CHRAJ) in Ghana are identified as best practices by the Panel.\textsuperscript{163} However, the Ghana self-assessment notes that the decisions of CHRAJ have not always been respected by the government.\textsuperscript{164}

The country review report recommends increased budgetary allocations to ‘institutions dealing with the protection of women’s rights’.\textsuperscript{165} The POA provides for funding to women’s NGOs.\textsuperscript{166} GPRS II goes further and provides for increased budget for ‘women empowerment’ and strengthening of institutions including the establishment of Women and Juvenile Units at all police stations.\textsuperscript{167} The 2007 APRM progress report notes that the ‘Police Service’s Domestic Violence and Victim Support Unit (DOVVSU) … is beset with staffing, logistical and financial constraints.’\textsuperscript{168}

With regard to children’s rights the country review report recommends that the Ghana National Commission on Children is given more autonomy and that budgetary allocation to institutions dealing with children’s rights are increased.\textsuperscript{169}

Concerns are expressed in Ghana report about the institutional capacity of the Ghanaian electoral commission.\textsuperscript{170} These concerns are not reflected in the recommendations of the Panel or in the POA.

The summary of the self-assessment in the country review report notes the ‘human, institutional and resource problems’ of the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA).\textsuperscript{171} However, there are no recommendations with regard to the EPA which is also not mentioned in the POA. GPRS II notes the '[w]eak institutional capacities for environmental management at all levels', but does not include anything about measures to strengthen institutional capacity in the proposed strategies to address the situation.\textsuperscript{172}

Ghana is one of the countries which has displayed the clearest commitment to the APRM. The Ghana report has relatively good correlation between recommendations in the report and action points in the POA. A positive aspect of the implementation reports is how they bring out concerns which have emerged since the country review report and POA was concluded. There is also a clear link between the APRM process and GPRS II. Ghana displays a clear commitment to follow-up as evidenced by the elaborate implementation reports.

This chapter has illustrated that problems and possible solutions to human rights issues in Ghana raised in the APRM process have been raised previously by a number of actors. The APRM provided an opportunity to move from talk to action through the POA. However, a number of human rights issues and governance deficiencies which have received ample attention by other actors were not discussed at all in the APRM process. It should be noted that some of these issues have subsequently found their way into the APRM progress reports.

The POA ostensibly has the potential of setting the APRM apart from other governance monitoring by providing for time-bound action points linked to the findings of the report. However, from the progress reports produced by the Governing Council it is clear that not enough progress has been made in implementing the POA. A number of factors may have contributed to this situation. First, the often vague provisions of the POA make effective monitoring of implementation difficult. Second, the lack of prioritisation in the POA and the lack of distinction between projects which will be funded through the national budget and those requiring external funding, makes it difficult for the POA to feed into the budget process.
RWANDA

7.1 Introduction

The Rwanda self-assessment was conducted between January 2004 and March 2005 and the country review mission visited the country in April 2005. The country review report was discussed at the APRM Forum in January 2006. The Rwanda report is the shortest of the country review reports which have been concluded so far.¹

In this chapter a variety of sources are used to illustrate the human rights challenges which Rwanda faces including state reports to the African Commission, the Human Rights Committee and the CEDAW Committee and issues raised by these monitoring bodies.² The reports of the National Human Rights Commission are also considered.³ The performance analysis will look at the implementation of human rights relevant provisions of the POA and of recommendations or comments raised in the country review report. Rwanda has submitted three APRM implementation reports.⁴

² For an analysis of the political situation in the country at the time of the review mission see F Reyntjens ‘Rwanda, ten years on: From genocide to dictatorship’ (2004) 103 African Affairs 177-210.

⁴ Rwanda’s APR Programme of Action (PoA) implementation, progress report (June-December 2006) & Annex I: Rwanda’s implementation status of the APRM Programme of Action (PoA); APRM Annual Progress Report Series on Implementation of the National Programmes of Action (NPoA) – Republic of Rwanda 2007). It has not been possible to obtain the latest progress report presented to the APRM Forum in January 2009.
7.2 Linkages with other national plans

Rwanda adopted a development framework, Vision 2020, in 2000. This was followed by a poverty reduction strategy paper for the period 2002 to 2005 setting out concrete action points. The Economic Development and Poverty Reduction Strategy (EDPRS) 2008-2012 is Rwanda’s second development plan based on the PRSP process.\(^5\) Note should also be taken of the United Nations Development Assistance Framework (UNDAF) 2008-2012 which has been developed jointly by the UN and the Rwandan authorities.\(^6\) The only reference to the APRM in any of these two documents is a reference in the EDPRS to a finding in the APRM country review report that though a regulatory framework for corporate governance exists in Rwanda, this is not being enforced.\(^7\) UNDAF makes no reference whatsoever to the APRM.

EDPRS includes three ‘flagship’ programmes: ‘Sustainable Growth for Jobs and Exports’ focusing on infrastructure investment, ‘Vision 2020 Umurenge’ aims at ‘releasing the productive capacity of the poor in rural areas through a combination of public works, promotion of cooperatives, credit packages and direct support.’\(^8\) The third ‘flagship’ focuses on governance including anti-corruption efforts.

In Rwanda’s 2007 state report to the Human Rights Committee the EDPRS is described as being geared towards the achievement of high levels of economic growth, together with measures to increase revenue from farming and agricultural production and to diversify the economy, facilitate privatization, support private enterprise and encourage the establishment of cooperatives and other institutions to improve the economy of Rwanda.\(^9\)

It is thus clear that human rights are not a focus of the EDPRS.

7.3 Financing

The cost to implement the Rwandan POA is set at US$ 95 million, compared to US$ 5 billion for Ghana and US$ 5.3 billion for Kenya.\(^10\) Even considering the much smaller size of the Rwandan economy,\(^11\) it is likely that the sum is inadequate to cover even the governance deficiencies recognised in the POA. Indeed, much of the POA deals with developing policies in various fields and to a large extent does not cover implementation costs. In contrast the ‘public share’ of the cost to implement the EDPRS 2008-2012 is set at 3 434 billion Rwandan francs (RWF) corresponding to almost US$ 6.5 billion.\(^12\) More than half of the Rwandan budget is financed via external grants and loans.\(^13\)

As will be illustrated below the low financial requirement to implement the Rwandan POA as compared to the EDPRS is linked to the fact that many of the issues covered in the country review report were not addressed in the POA.

\(^9\) Third periodic report of Rwanda, UN Doc CCPR/C/RWA/3, 27 November 2007, para 132.

\(^12\) EDPRS 133. The country review report states that the yearly government revenues is US$ 365.9 million and expenditures US$ 402.9 million. By 2007 government revenues was estimated at US$ 801.8 million and expenditures to US$ 878.3 million. Measures to fill the finance gap are discussed in the EDPRS.

The discussion below will therefore include consideration as to whether human rights relevant issues that were left out of the POA were included in the EDPRS.

7.4 Adherence to international human rights standards and cooperation with international monitoring bodies

Ratification of international human rights instruments

The country review report notes the ‘tardiness’ in acceding to international treaties and in reporting on implementation.\(^\text{14}\) A number of treaties are listed as not having been ratified by Rwanda.\(^\text{15}\) Rather than recommending the ratification of the un-ratified UN instruments, the recommendations call for harmonising domestic laws with international commitments and the establishment of an ‘inter-ministerial structure to coordinate actions to enhance the rights of its citizens’.\(^\text{16}\)

There is no mention in the country review report of the fact that Rwanda at the time of the review had not ratified the Convention against Torture or its Optional Protocol. Rwanda has also not ratified the Convention on Migrant Workers. The National Commission for Human Rights has repeatedly called for the ratification of outstanding conventions.\(^\text{17}\) In its annual report for 2007 the Commission noted that the government had taken steps to ratify some conventions and remove reservations to others in line with its earlier recommendations.\(^\text{18}\)

Rwanda ratified CAT and the second optional protocol to the ICCPR in December 2008.

Rwanda has ratified virtually all the relevant African Union conventions, though the country review report incorrectly claims that Rwanda had at the time of the review not ratified the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child.\footnote{The Charter was ratified by Rwanda in May 2001.}

State reporting

The POA provides for the establishment of ‘a department in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs to report regularly on treaty provisions implementation’.\footnote{CRR Rwanda 175.} The time frame for this initiative is 2005-2006. The 2007 implementation report notes that this has not been ‘fully achieved’.\footnote{Annual Progress Report 2007 14. The report notes that reporting falls under the legal advisor of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs ‘who does not have supporting staff due to the Public Sector Reforms which have left fewer employees’.} The group consisting of representatives of relevant ministries and the National Commission for Human Rights was established in late 2007, though it has seemingly not improved the reporting record.\footnote{Rwanda submitted its 4th, 5th and 6th combined report to the CEDAW Committee in 2006 and its third periodic report under the ICCPR due in 1992 in July 2007. The CRC Committee considered Rwanda’s report, submitted in 2002, in 2004. Rwanda has not submitted a report to the CESCR Committee since 1987 and to the CERD Committee since 1999.} The most recent state reports, to the CEDAW Committee and the Human Rights Committee, were submitted before the establishment of this group. It is noticeable that the report to the Human Rights Committee followed a few months after the Committee had issued a ‘list of issues to be taken up in the absence of the third regular report of the Republic of Rwanda, expected on 10 April 1992’.\footnote{CCPR/C/RWA/Q/3, 22 November 2006. It must be noted that the state report fails to address most of the issues raised in the list of issues.} It must be noted that large portions of the state reports focus on restating constitutional and legislative provisions rather than looking at actual implementation.\textsuperscript{24}

Rwanda has submitted state reports to the African Commission quite regularly. The latest report covers 2002 to 2004 and is dated March 2005. However it was only submitted to the Commission in August 2007 and was considered by the Commission in November of the same year.\textsuperscript{25} Rwanda has submitted its initial report under the AU Solemn Declaration on Gender Equality.

Other cooperation with international human rights bodies

A Special Rapporteur on the situation of human rights in Rwanda was established by the UN Commission on Human Rights following the genocide in 1994. The name of the procedure was changed in 1997 to Special Representative. The mandate of the Special Representative was to make recommendations on how to improve the human rights situation in Rwanda, to facilitate the creation and effective functioning of an independent national human rights commission in Rwanda, and further to make recommendations on situations in which technical assistance to the Government of Rwanda in the field of human rights may be appropriate.\textsuperscript{26}

\textsuperscript{24} The state report on CEDAW (2007) is the most elaborate, but it can be seen from the list of issues (2007) that the information provided is not adequate. The state report to the African Commission (2005) is somewhat better at providing information on actual implementation with regard to socio-economic rights than with regard to civil and political rights. However, as noted the report was submitted more than two years after it was prepared thus providing outdated information.

\textsuperscript{25} Concluding observations and recommendations on the eighth periodic report of the Republic of Rwanda (2002-2004) adopted at the 42nd ordinary session of the ACHPR held from 14 November to 28 November 2007, Brazzaville, Republic of Congo (on file with author). (Hereafter Concluding observations 2007). I have not been able to obtain the concluding observations on the state report of Rwanda considered in 2004.

The Special Representative visited Rwanda regularly until the mandate was ended in April 2001. The latest visit by a thematic UN special procedure to Rwanda was the visit by the Special Rapporteur on violence against women, who visited the country in 1997. Rwanda has not extended a standing invitation to UN special procedures to visit the country. Rwanda will be considered by the Universal Periodic Review in 2011.

Equality and non-discrimination

The African Commission in its concluding observations on Rwanda’s 2007 state report notes that ‘the Report provides only a general description of the legislation and/or policy put in place’ to protect women’s rights.’ The CEDAW Committee in its 2008 list of issues following Rwanda’s state report called for more ‘statistical data disaggregated by sex’.

The APRM country review report notes that the country has made great strides with regard to gender equality. That women have 49% of the seats in the Rwandan Chamber of Deputies is noted as a best practice. It is also

noteworthy that following the local elections in early 2006, more than 40% of politicians at the local level are women.\(^{33}\)

The country review report notes that there is still societal discrimination against women and despite the efforts already undertaken much remains to be done to address the situation.\(^{34}\) However, the Panel does not expand on what should be done and its recommendations are limited to capacity building for parliamentarians. However, not even this recommendation is reflected in the POA.\(^{35}\) The Rwandan government has indicated that discriminatory legislation is currently being reviewed.\(^{36}\)

Both the African Commission and the CEDAW Committee have highlighted the lack of information from the government on measures taken to combat violence against women.\(^{37}\) The CEDAW Committee also notes the lack of information on measures taken against trafficking and prostitution.\(^{38}\) Rwanda’s state report on implementation of the ICCPR notes that a special unit dealing with domestic violence has been established within the Rwandan police and that police and prosecutors have been trained.\(^{39}\)

Rwanda’s 2007 report on implementation of CEDAW illustrates the lack of employment opportunities for women.\textsuperscript{40} The EDPRS sets out that measures will be taken to ‘widen the occupational choices facing women and to eliminate gender-based wage discrimination.’\textsuperscript{41}

\textit{Life}

The country review report notes that Rwanda has one of the highest maternal mortality rates in the world.\textsuperscript{42} Despite this recognition, the problem of extremely high child and maternal mortality is not addressed in the recommendations in the report. The POA provides for substantial resources to be set aside for access to obstetric services to decrease the maternal mortality rate.\textsuperscript{43} The 2007 progress report notes that child and maternal mortality rates improved from 2000 to 2005, but that there are still major discrepancies between rural and urban areas.\textsuperscript{44} A number of interventions to further reduce maternal mortality rates are provided in the EDPRS.\textsuperscript{45}

At the time that the country review was conducted there were around 600 prisoners on death row in Rwanda. However, the country review report only addresses the death penalty with regard to children without providing any examples that Rwanda had applied the death penalty to this group.\textsuperscript{46} The subsequent abolition of the death penalty in Rwanda in July 2007 should be seen as a stepping stone to secure the extradition of genocide suspects to Rwanda.\textsuperscript{47}

Recently there have been reports of killings of detainees by the police, in particular in areas which have seen increased attacks against genocide survivors in connection with gacaca proceedings. According to the government cases of alleged forced disappearances and extra-judicial killings are investigated and the responsible persons tried and convicted. However, no information on such trials has been provided by the government.

Slavery and forced labour

According to the country review report everyone in the country participate in umuganda, ‘public projects on a voluntary basis’ every last Saturday of the month. The report notes that people ‘may be stopped by police and questioned as to why they are not … involved in Umuganda’. This raises the question whether this practice is really voluntary. However, there is no indication that international human rights monitoring bodies have considered the practice to fall outside the exception for ‘normal civil obligations’ as provided in article 8(3)(c)(iv) of the ICCPR. The EDPRS envisages that participation in umuganda should increase.

Torture and cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment

Rwanda’s 2007 state report on implementation of the ICCPR lists a number of statutory provisions prohibiting torture and excluding evidence obtained through torture. However, no information is provided on the practical implementation of these provisions, except for training aimed at the prevention of torture has been held for police officers, prosecutors, doctors and in schools.\textsuperscript{55} Torture and other forms of ill-treatment have been reported by the National Commission for Human Rights and other sources, but the issue is not brought up in the country review report.

The country review report does not mention anything about overcrowding and the dismal conditions in Rwandan prisons and other detention centres which has been identified as a problem by various human rights monitoring bodies including the African Commission.\textsuperscript{56} However, there have been some efforts to address the problem of overcrowding such as the introduction of community service as an alternative to custodial sentences.\textsuperscript{57}

Article 26 of Act 38/2006 sets out what conditions of detention are acceptable in Rwanda. It is clear that these requirements have not been implemented.\textsuperscript{58} This has even been recognised by the state. Despite language such as ‘inalienable right’ in the article, the 2007 state report on the implementation of the ICCPR notes that the ‘high standards [of article 26] are sometimes beyond the country’s capacity to meet’ but that they ‘constitute a goal to be attained in the shortest possible time.’\textsuperscript{59} The state thus argues for progressive realisation of rights which under both national and international law should be implemented without delay.

In its annual report for 2002 the National Human Rights Commission called on the government to find ‘a solution to the big problem of illegal arrests and detentions …’.\textsuperscript{60} The National Commission has also in later reports highlighted cases of prolonged detention in police cells, detention without warrants, illegal detention by gacaca courts and detention after expiry of sentence.\textsuperscript{61} The 2007 state report on the implementation of the ICCPR only sets out the legislative provisions aimed at protecting this right without addressing the problem of non-implementation,\textsuperscript{62} even stating that ‘[f]aced with the risk of sanctions for unlawful detention, the judicial and prison authorities make sure that no one remains in detention for even a day longer than the legally prescribed term.’\textsuperscript{63} In its list of issues the UN Human Rights Committee takes note of allegations put forward by the National Human Rights Commission with regard to illegal and secret detention centres.\textsuperscript{64}

\textit{Access to justice and fair trial}

The main focus in the country review report is on gacaca ‘as the most important vehicle for access to justice’.\textsuperscript{65} This might be true in the context of justice in the aftermath of the genocide, but access to justice is much broader than this. Surprisingly, the only recommendation by the Panel relates to the gacaca system. Many observers, including the authors of the country review report, have criticised aspects of the gacaca system for restricting the right to a fair trial, for example by not allowing legal representation and the lack of training of gacaca prosecutors and judges.\textsuperscript{66} There are also serious concerns with regard to fair trial in the ordinary justice system.\textsuperscript{67}

\textsuperscript{64} ICCPR list of issues (2006) para 8.
\textsuperscript{67} Human Rights Watch \textit{Law and reality - Progress in judicial reform in Rwanda} (2008).
The independence of the judiciary is an important component of the right to a fair trial. The country review report notes that the ‘fusion of powers’ in the executive in Rwanda is seen as a ‘recipe for danger’. The Panel makes several recommendations with the view of ensuring the independence of the judiciary and strengthening the Bar Association. None of these recommendations are reflected in the POA. However, the Rwandan government was not satisfied with simply ignoring the recommendations. In addition to comments in its written response to the country review report, President Kagame also criticised the ‘misrepresentation’ at the Forum leading the Panel to attach an appendix to the country review report where it noted that the arguments of the government ‘were well-received’ and that ‘the Rwandan system of judicial appointments was comparable to that of many countries’. However, this neglects the factual dominance of the President over the Senate. The EDPRS takes the independence of the judiciary as a given.

The POA focuses on training for judges and lawyers and the 2007 progress report sets out what percentage of judges and members of the bar have attended various training courses and study tours. The progress report also notes the increased enrollment of law students at the universities. What the training has covered and whether the training has targeted the gacaca system is not clear.

Freedom of conscience and religion

The Human Rights Committee notes in its 2006 list of issues reports that some Jehovah’s Witnesses have allegedly been ill-treated when they have refused to participate in local armed security patrols.74

Freedom of expression and information

With regard to the right to freedom of information the country review report recommends the government to ‘strengthen the right of access by citizens to administrative documents and information’.75 This recommendation is not reflected in the POA.

The abuses of press freedom in Rwanda are well-documented.76 The situation for press freedom was critical when the country review report was drafted in 2005 and has, at least according to some observers, continued to deteriorate since then.77 The executive summary of the country review report notes that ‘Rwanda is making progress with freedom of expression’.78 However, elsewhere in the report it is noted that ‘effective structures allowing for the peaceful expression of dissent and competitive ideas … are lacking’.79 A new Press Law was adopted in 2003 and a High Council of the Press (HCP) established. The country review report notes that it ‘was not possible to confirm whether freedom of expression is being promoted or undermined by the regulatory regime

75 CRR Rwanda para 135.
77 The press freedom index of Rwanda dropped from 38 in 2005 when the country was ranked 122nd in the RSF’s World Press Freedom Index to 58,88 in 2007 when the country was ranked 147th just ahead of Saudi Arabia and Zimbabwe. The index improved slightly to 50 in 2008 which placed Rwanda on place 145 of 173 states on the index.
78 CRR Rwanda para 9.
79 CRR Rwanda para 76. The same ambivalent attitude to the situation is visible in the concluding observations of the African Commission on Rwanda’s 2007 state report, see paras 12, 27 and 31(m). On the legislative framework see ICCPR state report (2007) paras 250-261.
supervised by the HCP’. Consequently there is no recommendation with regard to freedom of expression in the country review report.

A law on ‘sectarianism’ was adopted in 2001. Sectarianism is defined as ‘the use of any speech, written statement or action that divides people, that is likely to spark conflicts among people, or that causes an uprising which might degenerate into strife among people based on discrimination …’. The official reason for this legislation is that ‘divisionism’ could lead to a new genocide and that the focus should therefore be on consensus. However, there are many examples on how the law on sectarianism and similar legislation has been used to suppress legitimate dissent.

Freedom of association and assembly

The country review report notes that ‘while the Rwanda Constitution guarantees freedom to form, join and belong to political parties, it simultaneously undermines that freedom by attaching onerous conditions, such as political parties not being able to operate at the grassroots below the provincial levels.’ It finds that ‘[p]olitical parties may be de jure authorised but de facto impossible to realise and operate freely’. Surprisingly, these strong words on political participation are not reflected in the recommendations of the Panel.

Though not included in the POA the issue of political participation is considered in the 2007 progress report which notes that political parties are now allowed to operate at the district, sector, cell and village levels.\textsuperscript{87}

\textit{Freedom of movement}

The resettlement of rural population in organised village settlements, called \textit{imidugudu}, after the genocide in 1994 has been criticised for coercing people to move to the new village sites from their traditional scattered homesteads.\textsuperscript{88} The Rwandan government implemented the policy to ‘facilitate rapid social economic development and to save land for production.’\textsuperscript{89} The country review report notes that the ‘communal setting was working well and addressed adequately the constraint to basic utilities.’\textsuperscript{90} The EDPRS provides that 5 700 new \textit{imidugudu} sites will be constructed. Inhabitants in seven districts ‘with the worst living conditions’ will thus be relocated to ‘better houses endowed with basic services.’\textsuperscript{91} It is estimated that by 2020 70\% of the population should be living in \textit{imidugudu} and 30\% in urban areas.\textsuperscript{92} There is no provision in the EDPRS stating that relocation of the rural population to \textit{imidugudu} should be voluntary.

Political participation

Many observers criticised the 2003 presidential and parliamentary elections in particular because of intimidation and violence in the period leading up to the elections. The AU observer team was not critical but it should be noted that the team arrived in the country less than a week before the presidential election. Meierhenrich concludes an analysis of the elections and the international response to them: ‘the establishment of democratic procedures produced remarkably little democratic substance in terms of participation and contestation’ and ‘paved the way for constitutional dictatorship.’ He criticised international organisations for failing ‘to appreciate the difference between electoral outcomes and democratic outcomes.’

The country review report on the other hand congratulates the government on its ‘dogged determination to build new institutions and reform old ones in order to secure a democratic and peaceful future’ culminating in the elections of 2003. The recommendations in the country review report deals with capacity building for the Electoral Commission. The Panel further recommends that the ‘method of voting in local elections in which voters line up behind their candidates should be changed’. These recommendations are not reflected in the POA.

Property

The Rwandan self-assessment identifies land as a ‘very serious source of conflict’. The recommendations by the Panel to the Rwandan government include maintaining ‘its impetus to ensure that access to basic amenities is not restricted to the urban areas’ and ‘continue to research alternative means of livelihood to alleviate the land issue.’ Among the actions taken by the authorities is the decentralisation of land registration and efforts to redistribute ‘unutilized large farm land’. An act on land tenure was adopted in 2005.

Work

Most Rwandans live in the countryside and are dependent on land for their livelihood. The country review report notes the need for a ‘clear land and population policy’ including the creation of more ‘off-farm employment’. The report notes that the Rwandan government ‘is trying to promote economic and social rights by creating public works to encourage employment.’ According to the country review report 13 micro finance institutions have been established which will help to create employment in small-scale enterprises. The POA includes the development of a national policy on employment and a micro finance policy by 2006. Such policies were adopted in September 2006.

The country review team argued for further privatisation of state owned enterprises:\textsuperscript{106}

To date, the Secretariat has already sold 39 companies in various sectors: agriculture and agro-industry; hotels and tourism; industry; mining; energy; service; and the financial sector (banking and insurance). The CRM believes that the Government needs to regulate the utility sectors, but gradually withdraw from the actual management of these services.

The country review report notes that the Privatisation Secretariat considers the rights of workers in its discussions with potential investors. The POA provides for continued privatisation, but also, importantly, for a survey on the impact of privatisation.\textsuperscript{107} The 2007 progress report indicates that the government is well under way with this strategy of government divestment.\textsuperscript{108}

\textit{Health}

The country review report notes that the latest statistics indicate an increase in the number of physicians and nurses.\textsuperscript{109} A community based health insurance scheme has been established.\textsuperscript{110} There are plans to set the membership fee at 1000 Rwanda francs (US$ 2) nationally.\textsuperscript{111} This was endorsed by the Panel.\textsuperscript{112} While increased enrolment in the scheme is beneficial, the report does not address those who cannot afford the membership fee. With regard to HIV and AIDS, both the African Commission and the CEDAW Committee has noted the need for anti-retroviral treatment.\textsuperscript{117} The country review report notes that Rwanda is receiving significant international assistance to the health sector including the provision of anti-retroviral treatment.\textsuperscript{118} However, the Panel recommends that more resources should be committed to constructing ‘antiretroviral centres’ in rural areas.\textsuperscript{119} This is not reflected in the POA. However, the EDPRS includes efforts to address HIV and AIDS, including the provision of anti-retroviral treatment.\textsuperscript{120} There were 173 health centres distributing anti-retrovirals in October 2007, up from 129 in 2006.\textsuperscript{121}

With regard to reproductive health, the CEDAW Committee has raised concern with regard to the availability and affordability of contraceptives.\textsuperscript{122} The state report to CEDAW notes that religion also plays a role in the limited use of contraceptives.\textsuperscript{123} The POA provides for a family planning campaign in line with the Panel’s recommendation at efforts to decrease population growth.\textsuperscript{124}

According to a survey Rwandans rank access to safe water as more important than access to roads, health facilities, education and electricity.\textsuperscript{125} The country review report notes that a law on water management has been adopted and that a sanitation policy is being developed.\textsuperscript{126} The report also notes that social spending has increased from 2003 to 2005 including an increase in spending on water and sanitation in the national budget from 0.8\% to 2.4\%.\textsuperscript{127} In 2001 it was estimated that 60\% of those living in rural areas and 40\% of those living in urban areas did not have access to safe drinking water.\textsuperscript{128} By 2006 the situation had improved somewhat with one-third of Rwandans not having access to safe drinking water.\textsuperscript{129} The country review reports note that access to safe water was one of the reasons behind the \textit{imidugudu} policy discussed above.\textsuperscript{130} The POA only included the formulation of a policy on water utilisation.\textsuperscript{131} The EDPRS goes much further in its efforts to ensure access to safe water and sanitation.\textsuperscript{132}

Education

The Panel recommends the building of more schools to increase enrolment, without discussing the need to increase the number of teachers. Enrolment in primary schools has improved significantly and, according to the 2007 progress report, Rwanda is on track to achieve the MDG goal of universal primary education for all by 2015.\(^\text{133}\) However, increased enrolment has led to a pupils per teacher ratio of 74 in 2007,\(^\text{134}\) despite the 2007 progress report noting that the number of qualified primary school teachers rose by 40% between 2002 and 2007.

The progress report does not consider that international human rights instruments talk of free primary education. The most expensive item for Rwandan primary school pupils is school uniforms. The cost for secondary education is much higher and only 10% of children enrol for secondary education.\(^\text{135}\) The CEDAW Committee has noted the high female illiteracy rate and high drop out rate of girls in schools.\(^\text{136}\)

Housing

The APRM self-assessment notes that ‘the effects of genocide have caused massive destruction of shelter’.\(^\text{137}\) The response has been to provide ‘space for the construction of cheaper houses’.\(^\text{138}\) The POA provides for a review of the ‘policy on imidugudu to incorporate new shelter designs to cater for basic shelter needs of the population and their socio-economic activities with specific emphasis on assisting vulnerable groups’. As noted above the imidugudu policy is further endorsed in the EDPRS which also provides that 10 000 hectares of land should be provided with services for housing.

Lack of electricity is seen as ‘a hindrance to business development’. In its response to the country review report the government notes that it has ‘embarked on an ambitious programme aimed at alleviating electricity shortage’. There is no reference to electricity in the POA. However, the 2007 progress report notes progress with regard to increase of electricity generation. The report does not deal with the non-availability of electricity for the majority of the population.

7.6 Protection of vulnerable groups

Children

In its concluding observations on the implementation of the Convention of the Rights of the Child, the CRC Committee calls for the adoption of a ‘comprehensive children’s code’. The Committee further expresses concern over lack of resources for the implementation of children’s rights and the lack of disaggregated data. The Committee gives extensive recommendations to the government including calls for legislation prohibiting corporal punishment and campaigns against child abuse. The Committee notes that one-third of Rwandan children are orphans and call for support to these children and the development of alternative forms of care. Many orphans have ended up as street children. The number of street children has according to the country review report dropped significantly by providing housing under the imidugudu scheme.\(^{144}\) Child labour remains a problem in Rwanda despite legislative and educational efforts.\(^{145}\)

The Panel’s recommendations with regard to children’s rights in the country review report are not very clear and seemingly do not draw at all on the concluding observations of the CRC Committee, adopted in July 2004 and thus available at the time of the country review mission. A provision on reintegration of children is possibly referring to former child soldiers. The Panel further recommends that Rwanda ‘[w]ithdraws reservation on compulsory education and criminalises the act of not sending children to schools.’\(^{146}\) It is not clear which reservation is referred to and it is questionable whether criminalisation is a good way to increase school attendance. The POA provides for a study to review the rights of children and youth and the enactment of laws and establishment of institutions to ‘ensure children’s rights and welfare’.

Other vulnerable groups

The Panel recommends Rwanda to ‘step up efforts to provide education, health and housing for displaced persons and/or refugees’ and to initiate an ‘in-depth dialogue with the Batwa’\(^{147}\). The contention of the Panel that the authorities aim for the assimilation of the Batwa minority, was strongly contested by the government in its response to the report.

\(^{144}\) CRR Rwanda para 147.

\(^{147}\) CRR Rwanda para 156. The situation of the Batwa is also discussed by the African Commission in its concluding observations on Rwanda’s 2007 state report. Paras 16-18, 31(e)-(g). For the view of the government see eg state report to the African Commission (2005) 42.
The focus of the EDPRS with regard to vulnerable groups is on orphaned and vulnerable children and on people living with HIV.\textsuperscript{148} Vulnerable children are held to include ‘the extreme poor, orphans, refugees, returnees, and the physically and mentally disabled.’\textsuperscript{149} As could be expected there is no mention of the Batwa minority in the EDPRS.

7.7 Compliance with peoples’ rights

Self-determination

Rwanda’s state report to the African Commission, dated 2005, notes that Rwanda ‘advocates the self-determination of neighboring peoples.’\textsuperscript{150} This statement is difficult to reconcile with the activities of Rwandan forces in the DRC as documented by among others the African Commission and the UN.\textsuperscript{151} The country review report illustrates state responsibility for acts abroad in discussing the issue of plunder of natural resources in the DRC and recommends that the authorities ‘clarify, in the most transparent way, the conduct of Rwandan troops and security operatives in the DRC to bring satisfactory closure to this matter together with the UN and the DRC.’\textsuperscript{152}

Development

The 2007 progress report notes that the external debt of Rwanda dropped from 65.3% of GDP in 2005 to 13.9% in 2006 due to debt relief.\textsuperscript{153} Less debt service means increased resources available to realise the right to development. As noted above the EDPRS rather than the POA will be used by Rwanda to guide its development efforts.

Peace and security

An important aspect of ensuring peace and stability is how to handle atrocities of the past. The Rwandan report commended the establishment of a National Unity and Reconciliation Commission and the establishment of gacaca courts to try alleged participants in the 1994 genocide.\(^{154}\)

7.8 Human rights education

The African Commission has called on Rwanda to provide education on human rights to the legal profession and members of the gacaca courts.\(^{155}\) The annual reports of the National Human Rights Commission illustrates that it has been quite active in its education efforts.

7.9 Domestic institutions for the protection of human rights

The National Human Rights Commission was established by law 4/99 of 12 March 1999.\(^{156}\) Its mandate was expanded by law 37/2002 of 31 December 2002.\(^{157}\) The mandate of the National Commission for Human Rights, as it is now known, which includes the consideration of complaints of human rights violations, is to some extent duplicated by the Office of the Ombudsman.\(^{158}\) Two institutions are provided for in the Constitution specifically to deal with the rights of women: the Gender Monitoring Office and the National Council of Women.\textsuperscript{159} There is also a Ministry of Gender and Promotion of Women.\textsuperscript{160}

The POA does not reflect the recommendations to provide increased capacity for the Electoral Commission, the judiciary, the civil service, the ombudsman and female parliamentarians. However, in 2007 the Rwandan government together with UNDP and DFID\textsuperscript{161} launched a US$ 10 million programme for the period 2007 to 2010 to strengthen good governance through institutional support to the Office of the Ombudsman, the National Human Rights Commission, the National Unity and Reconciliation Commission, the National Electoral Commission and the High Council of the Press.\textsuperscript{162} The report setting out the UNDP/DFID project clearly links it to the APRM country review report.

As noted above the lack of data has been raised by many monitoring bodies. To improve the availability of reliable data a National Institute of Statistics was established in 2005.\textsuperscript{163}

The POA is only 30 pages and is not adequately linked to the findings in the country review report, in particular with regard to democracy and political governance. While it is clear that many recommendations could have been more clearly formulated, the main problem is seemingly a lack of political will on the part of the Rwandan government to take on recommendations of the country review report dealing with human rights, in particular civil and political rights. It follows that the Rwandan POA is clearly inadequate. Indeed, the EDPRS is to some extent stronger on human rights, probably as a result of donor influence.

Increased institutional capacity is identified throughout the country review report as necessary to improve governance. Jordaan is of the view that the focus on lack of capacity is a way to avoid apportioning blame. He argues that this is particularly cowardly with regard to the violation of political rights and freedoms, for these abuses, as violations of so-called negative rights, already imply “capacity” and an identifiable perpetrator or unjust law.\textsuperscript{164} However, as noted above the country review report does draw attention to some of the abuses of the Rwandan state in relation to political rights etc. To take this stand is important. However, it is clear that the APRM can only play a very limited role in effectuating change with regard to issues which the government for what ever reason considers should not fall within the purview of the review process.

8.1 Introduction

The Kenya self-assessment was conducted between July 2004 and August 2005. A country review mission visited Kenya in October 2005, followed by a follow-up mission in April 2006. The POA was finalised in June 2006 ahead of the consideration of the report by the APRM Forum.¹

8.2 Linkages with other national plans

The introduction to the Kenyan POA states:²

The development of … the POA has taken into account existing Government programme frameworks and sectoral plans. However, the views articulated by stakeholders during the APRM process have remained paramount; and are the basis of the objectives, activities and priorities in the POA.

An interim Poverty Reduction Strategy Paper was adopted in 2001. It was followed by the Economic Recovery Strategy for Wealth and Employment Creation (2003-2007). Follow up to these strategies have been weak.³ The State of Human Rights Report 2003-2004 of the Kenya National Commission on Human Rights to some extent evaluated implementation at the early stages, but later annual reports of the Commission does not follow this approach. The new development plan Vision 2030 was launched in June 2008. The first Medium Term Plan covers 2008-2012.

The Kenya National Commission on Human Rights and the Ministry of Justice and Constitutional Affairs have been in the process of developing a National Policy and Action Plan (NPAP) on Human Rights for several years. At the time of writing the NPAP had not yet been adopted. The need for a national action plan for human rights is not mentioned in the APRM country review report.

8.3 Financing

The cost to implement the POA is US$ 5.3 billion, of which close to 9 million for democracy and political governance, 45 million for economic governance, 4.9 billion for corporate governance and 387 million for socio-economic development. However, it must be noted that corporate governance includes many interventions that would be more logically placed under other governance areas. The highest projected expenditure in the POA is an estimated US$ 2 billion (150 billion Kenyan shillings) to improve the road network. The 2007 progress report notes that the road budget for the fiscal year 2007/2008 has increased from KShs 42.5 billion to KShs 62.1 billion. It was further increased to KShs 65 billion (US$ 1 billion) in the 2008/2009 budget. The focus on road construction is not only a result of the need for improved infrastructure, but also used as a means of reducing unemployment.

According to Kenya’s budget for 2008/2009 the government has secured financing from donors for development expenditure to the amount of KShs 33.8 billion (US$ 536 million) in grants and KShs 47.4 billion (US$ 752 million) in loans. This can be compared with the 2006 medium-term budget strategy paper which projected an external financing need in the form of project support of US$ 559 million in grants and US$ 611 million in loans for the 2008/2009 budget. The total expenditure under the 2008/2009 budget is KShs 693.6 billion (US$ 11 billion) of which KShs 196.2 billion (US$ 3.1 billion) in development expenditure.

8.4 Adherence to international human rights standards and cooperation with international monitoring bodies

Ratification of international human rights instruments

The country review report lists a number of treaties as not having been ratified by Kenya. The report calls on the government to ratify ‘the outstanding international instruments’. The response of the government notes that it will ‘consider signing and ratification of these protocols wherever relevant and applicable’.\textsuperscript{15} The POA sets out that ‘all relevant standards and codes’ should be ratified by 2010.\textsuperscript{16} The June 2007 implementation report states that none of the instruments listed as not ratified in the country review report had been acceded to by the time the report was compiled.\textsuperscript{17} The implementation report notes that the State Law Office is going to establish a database over ratified treaties.

The country review report further recommends that Kenya ratify ILO Convention 87 related to the Freedom of Association.\textsuperscript{18} ILO Convention 87 is one of eight ‘fundamental conventions’ of the ILO which has been ratified by almost all ILO member states.\textsuperscript{19} In its response the Kenyan government notes that it will ‘study’ the convention before deciding on whether to ratify it.\textsuperscript{20}

The country review report notes that the mission was ‘unable to verify Kenya’s adherence to reporting timelines’.\textsuperscript{21} It is unclear why the mission did not use the information on reporting that is publicly available on the websites of the UN High Commissioner and the African Commission. In its response to the country review report, dated June 2006, the Kenyan government notes that it ‘is committed to fulfilling all reporting obligations and is up to date in reporting’ with regard to CRC, CEDAW, CAT, ICCPR and ICESCR.\textsuperscript{22} Kenya submitted its second report to the Human Rights Committee, due in 1986, in September 2004, its second periodic report to the Committee on the Rights of the Child in September 2005, and its fifth and sixth combined reports to the CEDAW Committee in March 2006. Kenya submitted its initial report to the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in September 2006, and its first report to the Committee against Torture only in June 2007, one year after stating that it was up to date with reporting under the treaty. The government response to the APRM country review report does not mention CERD, which was ratified by Kenya in September 2001. No state report has been submitted to the CERD Committee.

Kenya submitted its first state report to the African Commission in September 2006, more than 14 years after ratifying the African Charter. The report was considered by the Commission in May 2007. Kenya has also submitted a state report to the Committee monitoring compliance with the African Charter on the Rights and Welfare of the Child.

It is clear that Kenya’s reporting record has improved significantly in the last few years. The Kenya National Commission on Human Rights has contributed to this positive development by

- capacity building training on treaty provisions and reporting guidelines;
- participation in writing reports; review, critique and validation of the draft reports;

participation during the consideration of reports by the Committees; and follow up on the implementation of the treaty body recommendations by Government.\footnote{30}

The CEDAW Committee notes in its 2007 concluding comments on Kenya’s state report that it ‘appreciates the fact that the Government has held workshops with a range of governmental bodies and non-governmental organisations on the implementation of the concluding comments subsequent to the consideration of Kenya’s combined third and fourth periodic report in 2003’.\footnote{31} However it is clear that most of the recommendations in the 2003 concluding comments were not implemented and was therefore repeated in the 2007 concluding comments.\footnote{32}

\textit{Other cooperation with international human rights bodies}

The Special Rapporteur on the sale of children, child prostitution and child pornography visited Kenya in 1997 and the Special Rapporteur on torture in 1999. More recent visits were undertaken in February 2004 (Special Rapporteur on housing), December 2006 (Special Rapporteur on indigenous people), March 2008 (Representative of the Secretary General on Internally Displace Persons) and February 2009 (Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions).\footnote{33} Kenya is scheduled to be reviewed by the Universal Periodic Review in 2010.

8.5 Compliance with substantive human rights norms

Equality and non-discrimination

The country review report found that the Economic Recovery Strategy ‘is not very explicit on the goal of reducing inequalities between men and women and empowering women.’ Other challenges include customary law preventing women to inherit land, low enrolment figures for girls in particular in North-Eastern Province and higher infection rates of HIV among women than men. Positive aspects include increased budget allocation for gender mainstreaming and improved gender-disaggregated statistical data.

The country review report includes a call on Parliament to pass the Affirmative Action Bill, the Gender and Development Bill, the Equality Bill and the Domestic Violence Bill. Already in its 2003 concluding comments the CEDAW Committee called for the speedy enactment of the two latter bills. In its response to the country review report the government notes that the Affirmative Action Bill and the Equality Bill ‘are being addressed within the context of a new constitutional dispensation’. However, the POA provides for the adoption of all the bills listed above. The POA also provides that inheritance laws should be

41 CRR Kenya 396-397. It is unclear what bill the ‘Gender and Development Bill’ refers to. The National Commission on Gender and Development Bill was enacted in 2003 and the amended to provide for equality between men and women. According to the 2007 progress report a Family Protection Bill that would regulate inheritance is being drafted. The POA also provides for civic education on women’s rights to be conducted from 2006 to 2008.

Domestic violence has been highlighted as a concern by among others the CEDAW Committee. Adoption of the Domestic Violence Bill is provided for in the POA. The time frame for this and other measures to prevent violence against women is 2006-2008. The 2007 APRM progress report gives at hand that the Domestic Violence Bill and the Equality Bill have been enacted, but this is not the case. A Sexual Offences Act was adopted in 2006.

The CEDAW Committee has called for measures to ensure the eradication of female genital mutilation (FGM) in both its 2003 and 2007 concluding comments. The Panel’s recommendations with regard to FGM focus on enforcement of the law prohibiting FGM and make no mention of other necessary efforts such as education. The POA include measures against FGM under measures to protect the rights of children.

While it makes no reference to the concluding comments of the CEDAW Committee, the recommendations in the country review report includes a call on concluding comments on Kenya’s state report under CEDAW, the CEDAW Committee called on the state to ‘put in place without delay a comprehensive strategy, including legislation, to modify or eliminate cultural practices and stereotypes that discriminate against women’.\textsuperscript{52} The Committee includes polygamy and bride price among the traditional practices which should be addressed ‘vigourously’. Polygamy and bride price is not even mentioned as a concern in the same Committee’s 2003 concluding comments on Kenya’s previous state report and are also not addressed in the country review report.\textsuperscript{53}

The UN Human Rights Committee has urged Kenya to repeal article 162 of the Penal Code which criminalises homosexuality.\textsuperscript{54}

The CEDAW Committee has called for affirmative action to increase the number of women in decision-making positions.\textsuperscript{55} According to the country review report women held 8.3\% of the seats in Parliament in 2006.\textsuperscript{56} In August 2007 the CEDAW Committee noted that only 4.8\% of members of Parliament were women.\textsuperscript{57} The 2007 APRM progress report stated that at least 30\% of MPs should be women after the elections in December 2007.\textsuperscript{58} However the elections only marginally improved the situation and as of July 2009, 22 of the 224 members of Parliament were women. The POA provides for the development of an affirmative action policy, though it is not made clear what areas it will cover. A presidential notice was issued in 2006 to the effect that women should constitute at least 30% of new recruits to the public service.

Regional inequality was indicated as a serious source of conflict in the country review report. Weak security in the North Eastern Province has led to the creation of militias and traffic in arms across the border with Somalia. The Panel called for affirmative action programmes for the North Eastern Province and other disadvantaged areas. The POA include measures to ensure balanced regional resource allocations.

Life

The CEDAW Committee has expressed concern over high maternal and infant mortality. The POA provides for increase of budgetary allocation to health as a means of decreasing mortality rates, but provides no details. The 2007 progress report notes health initiatives such a distribution of mosquito nets to pregnant women and children under five, immunisations and increase in the number of health facilities.

The respect for civil and political rights is highlighted as a best practice in the country review report: ‘Political and civil rights are exercised with a considerable degree of freedom’. This assertion goes contrary to the UN Human Rights Committee, which has noted many deficiencies with regard to Kenya’s implementation of the ICCPR, for example impunity of law enforcement officers for extrajudicial killings.\textsuperscript{68} The country review report recommends the Kenya National Human Rights Commission to ‘check human rights transgressions of law enforcement officers’ and sensitise citizens about their right to seek redress.

It also requested law enforcement agencies to train their staff in human rights.\textsuperscript{69} The 2007 progress report notes that a human rights code of conduct for law enforcement has been developed and that training efforts are ongoing.\textsuperscript{70}

Though no execution has been carried out in Kenya since 1988, the UN Human Rights Committee has raised concern about the death penalty, in particular that it is applicable to crimes not considered to be the ‘most serious’ in terms of article 6 of the ICCPR.\textsuperscript{71} The African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights has recommended that Kenya should abolish the death penalty.\textsuperscript{72}

\textit{Slavery and forced labour}

Trafficking has been highlighted as a concern by both the UN Human Rights Committee and the CEDAW Committee.\textsuperscript{73} The country review report notes that:\textsuperscript{74}

According to the ILO, the Government of Kenya has not fully complied with the minimum standards for the elimination of trafficking. Kenya is thus currently classified as Tier 2 Watch List because the absolute number of trafficking victims is significant and there are no clear evidence of efforts to combat trafficking in persons.

The country review report discusses the problem of trafficking in the context of children’s rights, thus leaving out other categories of victims of trafficking. The recommendations of the Panel calls for a national action plan against child trafficking and child labour.\textsuperscript{75} The government in its response notes that it is in the process of developing a bill to deal with child trafficking and child labour.\textsuperscript{76} The POA includes the development of a National Plan of Action to combat violations of children’s rights, without specifically mentioning trafficking.\textsuperscript{77}

Torture in police custody has been highlighted as a problem by among others the UN Human Rights Committee.\textsuperscript{78} The Kenyan National Commission on Human Rights has expressed concern over impunity for torture.\textsuperscript{79} This is not discussed in the APRM country review report. However, the Panel recommends the ratification of the Optional Protocol to the Convention against Torture, which provides for a system of visits to detention centres to prevent torture and other ill-treatment.\textsuperscript{80} In its response to this recommendation the government states that the reasons that it has not ratified the Optional Protocol is that it ‘outlaws capital sentence’, something that is not discussed at all in the CAT Optional Protocol but in the second Optional Protocol to the ICCPR.\textsuperscript{81} The UN Human Rights Committee has also expressed its concern about overcrowding in prisons and inadequate conditions of detention.\textsuperscript{82} The 2007 progress report takes note of the fact that OPCAT has not been ratified.\textsuperscript{83}

The UN Human Rights Committee has expressed concern over overcrowding in Kenyan prisons and its consequences for conditions of detention.\textsuperscript{84} The issue is not discussed in the country review report. However, the 2007 progress report notes that overcrowding in Kenyan prisons is being addressed through presidential pardons and non-custodial sentences.\textsuperscript{85}

\textit{Personal liberty and security}

The country review report notes that crime rose by 51\% between 1994 and 2000.\textsuperscript{86} The Governance, Justice, Law & Order Sector (GJLOS) Reform Programme includes crime prevention.\textsuperscript{87} The POA provides for the introduction of community policing.\textsuperscript{88} Efforts to address crime, including community policing, are summarised in the 2007 progress report.\textsuperscript{89}

\textit{Access to justice and fair trial and independence of the judiciary}

The UN Human Rights Committee has urged that all detainees should have the right to be brought promptly before a judge and have access to legal representation ‘during the initial stages of detention’.\textsuperscript{90} The Committee calls for legal aid ‘where the interests of justice so require’.\textsuperscript{91} Legal aid is not mentioned in the country review report. However, the POA provides for the development of ‘policy and institutional framework’ for legal aid ‘to the poor, marginalized and the vulnerable." The 2007 progress report notes that a National Legal Aid Scheme has been developed and is being implemented at six pilot sites.

The UN Human Rights Committee has expressed concern over lack of access to judicial remedies and ‘the frequent failure’ of enforcement of judgments. The country review report notes that the independence of the judiciary is insufficiently safeguarded and that the executive sometimes refuses to implement court orders further eroding the confidence of the public in the rule of law. The Panel recommends performance based contracts to improve efficiency and accountability. Other than this there are no recommendations of the Panel with regard to judicial independence despite the glaring problems raised in the report. The POA sets aside US $ 300 000 to address the backlog of court cases, but does not set out how the money will be used. A number of initiatives to reform the administration of justice are set out in the 2007 progress report.

The country review report found that some mass media are ‘dedicated to rousing ethnic hostilities’. The Panel recommended that media regulating bodies be empowered to ‘sanction irresponsible media organizations and professionals’. The preparation of an Act to this effect was included in the POA. This clearly constitutes a double-edged sword as if not carefully crafted such powers could be used to curb legitimate criticism. The 2007 progress report notes that a Media Bill is before Parliament and that a freedom to information policy has been drafted.\textsuperscript{102}

The 2003-2004 report of the Kenya National Commission on Human Rights notes that in several instances meetings organised by political parties or civil society organisations were prevented from taking place.\textsuperscript{103} The Commission urged the government and the police to interpret the Public Order Act from a human rights perspective which would include that ‘the Police must always aim to ensure that public meetings have adequate security but not merely stop a meeting on grounds of insecurity.’\textsuperscript{104} However, in the country review report violation of the freedom of assembly is only mentioned as an example of rights violated by the previous regime.\textsuperscript{105}

The country review report notes that ‘political parties are regional, ethnic based and poorly institutionalized.’\textsuperscript{106} The regulatory framework for registration of political parties did not discourage this and the Panel therefore recommended the speedy adoption of the Political Parties Bill.\textsuperscript{107} The Political Parties Act finally came into effect in October 2007.\textsuperscript{108} Section 14 of the new act prohibits ethnic or religious based parties.

Political participation

The country review report notes that the electoral system suffers from the big difference in constituency size and the unclear criteria on creation of new constituencies.\(^{109}\) The report also notes the 'enormous powers' of the Minister for Local Government over the composition of local councils.\(^{110}\)

Property

The country review report notes that the government should ‘adopt and implement redistribution and reallocation policies to enforce equitable access to, and use of land.’\(^{111}\) According to the 2007 progress report a national land policy has been adopted.\(^{112}\)

Work

The UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights has expressed concern with regard to the minimum wage and the lack of labour inspections. The Committee has also expressed concern with regard to the working conditions in export processing zones (EPZs).\(^{113}\) The country review report notes the non-compliance with labour laws in particular in EPZs.\(^{114}\) The recommendations of the Panel include that the Ministry of Labour should ‘investigate the infringement of labour laws in EPZs and severely punish all breaches of human rights by these entities.’\(^{115}\) The POA provides for capacity building of the Ministry of Labour and Human Resources Development and for the enforcement of labour laws in EPZs.\textsuperscript{116} In the 2007 progress report, EPZs are only discussed in the context of export incentive schemes in the context of the negotiation of an Economic Partnership Agreement with the European Union.\textsuperscript{117} However, the report takes note of training of labour officers and inspectors to improve compliance with labour laws in general.\textsuperscript{118}

To facilitate economic activity is important as it leads to job creation through both employment and opportunities for self-employment.\textsuperscript{119} However, there will always be people who have no means to sustain themselves. The recommendation in the country review report to ‘[d]evelop a comprehensive legal framework of social protection’ is therefore important.\textsuperscript{120} However, this is not taken up in the POA.

The UN Human Rights Committee has expressed its concern over the high number of deaths caused by AIDS and called for equal access to treatment.\textsuperscript{121} The country review report notes that AIDS has caused more than 1.5 million deaths in Kenya since the 1980’s and left 1 million children as orphans.\textsuperscript{122} The report considers the reduction of the HIV prevalence rate from 13\% to 7\% as a best practice.\textsuperscript{123} The Panel recommends the adoption of the HIV/AIDS

However, the 2007 progress report does not take note of this fact and the concerns expressed by the Kenyan National Commission on Human Rights that the Act has not been given a commencement date and that no regulations to make it operational has been adopted.\textsuperscript{126} With regard to a universal health care plan the 2007 progress report notes that discussions are underway between the Ministry of Health and the Ministry of Finance on how to finance and implement such a plan.\textsuperscript{127}

With regard to sexual and reproductive rights, the CEDAW Committee has called for improved sex education, in particular to adolescent girls and boys, and improved access to contraceptives and safe abortion.\textsuperscript{128} It should be noted that abortion is illegal in Kenya except when the mother’s life is in danger.\textsuperscript{129} The UN Human Rights Committee has linked high maternal mortality to unsafe abortion and called for review of the abortion laws.\textsuperscript{130} The country review report notes increased use of contraceptives as one of the outcomes of successful family planning campaigns in the past.\textsuperscript{131} However, the report provides no recommendations for the future.

Water and sanitation

In its list of issues the UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights requests information on ‘measures taken to ensure affordable access to adequate water and sanitation’ in light of the 2002 Water Act and ‘the recent privatization of water services’.\textsuperscript{132} Access to water is not much discussed in the country review report, but features extensively in the government’s response to the recommendation of the Panel to ‘work towards the achievement of the MDGs’.\textsuperscript{133} The POA notes that privatisation ‘is expected to improve accessibility to water’.\textsuperscript{134} The 2007 progress report notes significant increased budgetary allocation to the water sector, but does not assess whether the assumption in the POA that privatisation will lead to better access to water has proven correct.\textsuperscript{135} Sanitation is not discussed in the country review report but the 2007 progress report notes that a number of ‘sanitation schemes’ where rehabilitated.\textsuperscript{136}

Education

Free universal primary education, introduced in Kenya in 2003, is seen by the Panel as a best practice.\textsuperscript{137} The country review report notes that the increased number of pupils means calls for increased investment in education including the training of teachers.\textsuperscript{138} The Panel recommends the government to ‘[c]omprehensively address the issue of deteriorating standards in the education system by recruiting more teachers to reduce the high learner/teacher ratios, and improve the necessary infrastructure.’\textsuperscript{139}

It is strongly advised that government, in collaboration with UNHABITAT, intensify the slum upgrading and low cost housing initiative.\textsuperscript{150} The POA provides 225 million Kenyan shillings (US$ 3 million) for slum upgrading and building of low cost houses for the period 2006-2015.\textsuperscript{151}

Children

Under Kenyan law the age of legal responsibility is eight years. The UN Human Rights Committee has declared this to be a violation of article 24 of the ICCPR.\textsuperscript{152} The concluding observations of the Human Rights Committee welcomed the prohibition of all forms of corporal punishment of children and called for an information campaign to ensure the effective implementation of the ban.\textsuperscript{153} These issues are not discussed in the APRM country review report.

Child labour is a serious problem in Kenya and the APRM Panel recommends the government to develop a time-bound national action plan to address the issue.\textsuperscript{154} The POA takes a wider approach and provides for an action plan to combat violations of children’s rights.\textsuperscript{155} The POA also includes measures against early marriages.\textsuperscript{156} However, as noted by the Committee on the Rights

The Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural rights has expressed concern with regard to the treatment of refugees.\textsuperscript{159} In contrast the country review report commends Kenya for its hospitality to refugees.\textsuperscript{160} However, some problems are noted and the Panel recommends Kenya to ‘enact and implement a clear policy on refugees and internally displaced persons’.\textsuperscript{161} In its response the government notes that a refugee department has been established within the Ministry of Immigration and a refugees’ bill has been drafted.\textsuperscript{162} In line with a recommendation of the Panel the POA includes the streamlining of immigration screening procedures.\textsuperscript{163} The 2007 progress report notes that a Refugees Act was promulgated at the end of 2006.\textsuperscript{164} built on ethnicity. Following the recommendation of the Panel the POA includes that government and political parties should develop conflict resolution mechanisms. The violence following the December 2007 elections erased the notion of Kenya as a ‘haven of peace for the region’.

Development

The UN Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in its list of issues on Kenya’s state report under the ICESCR requested information on consultation, human rights impact assessment and consideration of vulnerable groups with regards to the negotiation of international agreements such as Economic Partnership Agreement with the EU and the COMESA investment agreement. This issue is not discussed in the country review report.

8.8 Human rights education

The country review report calls on the Kenyan National Commission on Human Rights and civil society organisations to conduct civic education with a view to ‘inculcating stakeholder consciousness and responsibility.’ The 2007 progress report notes that the government is working closely with the Commission in ‘developing materials for information and education campaigns to increase capacity of CSO’s in civic education, monitoring and reporting human rights.’ The report also notes that training manuals for provincial administration has been revised to reflect human rights.

8.9 Domestic institutions for the protection of human rights

The Kenya National Commission on Human Rights was established in 2003. The Commission in September 2008 submitted a shadow report with regard to Kenya's state report under the Convention against Torture. The Commission noted that government agencies, specifically the police, sometimes prevented its work, including visits to detention centres. That the Commission does not receive adequate resources has been noted by a number of observers.

The CEDAW Committee in its 2003 concluding comments called on the government to 'clearly define the mandate and responsibilities of the different mechanisms related to the advancement of women and gender equality and allocate sufficient budgetary resources to them.' This concern is reiterated in the same committee’s 2007 concluding comments.

8.10 Concluding remarks

The Kenyan POA to a large extent responds to recommendations of the Panel. It is therefore unfortunate that the country review mission has not made more use of findings of international human rights monitoring bodies, or even national human rights observers which should clearly have been consulted in the process. Fortunately the process has been inclusive enough to anyway raise many pertinent human rights issues which have found their way into the recommendations of the Panel. The 2007 progress report follows the structure of the POA, but more efforts should be made to ensure accuracy in the information provided. It would also be valuable for the progress report to react to new developments that might affect the realisation of the objectives set out in the Questionnaire.

9.1 Summary of findings

As illustrated in chapter 2, in the early 1990’s African leaders started to recognise that the promotion and protection of human rights form an important stepping stone to development. This acknowledgement of the importance of human rights took place at the same time as African leaders publicly conceded that the problems facing their countries were not only caused by an unfair world order but that improved domestic governance had an important role to play. Evidently, the international donor community played a role in this change of rhetoric.

In 2001, the New Partnership for Africa’s Development (NEPAD) was adopted as Africa’s new development framework. A comparison with earlier initiatives makes it clear that there is not much new in the policy prescriptions of NEPAD. It is instead in the framework to implement the vision underlying NEPAD that one can see the biggest change from the past. The African Peer Review Mechanism (APRM) was established to foster compliance with the Governance Declaration and all underlying international instruments, including in the field of human rights. This marks a step away from the largely rhetorical focus on human rights in the NEPAD Declaration.

As discussed in chapter 3, the Governance Declaration recognises the intrinsic value of human rights, but does not discuss socio-economic rights except as developmental goals. The focus on civil and political rights is somewhat surprising considering the rhetorical emphasis often given to socio-economic rights by African leaders.
The APRM Questionnaire plays an important role in framing the issues in the self-assessment, country review report and Programme of Action (POA). However, some important human rights issues such as freedom of the media and impunity are not dealt with at all in the Questionnaire. Despite the focus on aggregated outcomes with regard to socio-economic development, some of the indicators under this governance area illustrate recognition of human rights principles such as accountability and non-discrimination.

Chapter 4 examines whether the APRM is in itself a rights-based process. The chapter thus considers the extent to which the APRM lives up to the requirements of participation, accountability and transparency.

Many of the countries which have gone through the APRM process so far have in various ways made genuine stakeholder participation difficult. In some countries the whole process has been fully controlled by government. The country review mission is a tool of accountability as it aims at ensuring that the various views which have emerged as part of the national APRM process are indeed reflected in the self-assessment and that the POA, though a consensus document, reflects the findings of the self-assessment.

The recommendations in the country review report are not legally binding. However, even if they are not reflected in the final POA they can play a role by providing further argument in the domestic debate, including in the APRM follow-up process, and by being taken up by donors and other international stakeholders. The recommendations should also form the basis for the discussion in the Forum, though, as noted in chapter 4, the Forum discussion has so far not been very substantive.

Despite the importance of transparency for good governance, the APRM process is not very transparent. The completed self-assessments have not been published and in most cases are not even shared with stakeholders. This situation constitutes a serious hindrance to the development of an adequate POA and for the effectiveness of the whole APRM process.

At the time of writing only 29 out of 53 AU member states have signed up for the APRM. Chapter 5 illustrates that reasons for not signing the MOU include among others authoritarian rule, not seeing any benefit of the process and the cost involved. It is also noteworthy that the leaders of some of the countries which have been reviewed have expressed shock over criticism in the country review report. This experience, together with a lack of donors willing to fund the process, may explain why the APRM process has failed to take off in some states which lack democratic credentials.

There are many different theories of why states comply with international law and in particular human rights. The philosophy behind the APRM is closest to the managerial school of compliance theory which argues that compliance is achieved through dialogue and capacity building. It may be impossible to prove this or other theories of compliance, as causality between action and result is inherently difficult to establish.

The advantages and disadvantages of various methods of international monitoring, as compared to the APRM, are discussed in chapter 5. As a human rights monitoring mechanism, state reporting often suffers from lack of reliable information. Review meetings are brief and take place far from the country under review. On the other hand it could be argued that the extensive experience and knowledge of human rights treaty monitoring bodies places them in a better position to evaluate human rights compliance than the APRM.

Arguably the most useful working method of special rapporteurs, working groups and inquiry procedures is the on-site visit. Thematic visits are limited in scope but could play a major role in building pressure both domestically and internationally with regard to the issue under consideration. The APRM country review visit is an important means of verification but as the APRM covers many different areas there is a risk that important issues are not being sufficiently covered. On the other hand the holistic approach of the APRM arguably makes the necessity of prioritisation between competing demands more evident.

The newly established Universal Periodic Review (UPR) of the UN Human Rights Council is an example of the use of peer review for human rights. The UPR constitutes a potentially important complement to other UN mechanisms, such as state reporting, complaints procedures and special procedures. However, the UPR lacks the time bound, specific targets of the APRM POA. It is also noticeable that while the UPR provides for stakeholder submissions the process provides no space for engagement between various actors within the country as is the case with the APRM.

From the above overview it is clear that the APRM, in the human rights context, should be seen as a complement to the many mechanisms for the realisation of human rights that exist at the national, regional and global level.

A number of factors play a potential role with regard to the effectiveness of the APRM. The legal framework of the APRM is weak as it is established under a Memorandum of Understanding rather than a binding treaty. The country review reports make recommendations, not legally binding findings, to inform the POA. However, there is no indication that the legal framework of the APRM would affect the possibility of the recommendations in the report and the undertakings in the POA to induce compliance with human rights.

The expertise and independence of a monitoring body affects its effectiveness. In the APRM expertise is needed in many areas to identify shortcomings in the self-assessment and POA. One important aspect is to ensure that human rights concerns are sufficiently addressed. The Panel has so far had a balanced composition which should be able to adequately reflect on human rights issues in conjunction with consultants and partner institutions. With regard to independence the close association of some Panel members with government does not seem to have influenced the content of the first country review reports.

It is important for the Panel to consider the quality of its recommendations. The recommendations should be clearly linked to analysis in the report and primarily set out concrete activities which state institutions should undertake to realise the APRM objectives. In the context of human rights it is thus clear that the main potential of the APRM lies in being used as a pro-active, preventative tool which programmatically addresses ‘positive’ rights through a participative process with rights-based resource allocations in the POA.

Peer pressure between states is exercised bilaterally and in international organisations, both in formal and informal settings. Formal peer pressure with regard to human rights has been as woefully absent in the AU as in its predecessor the OAU despite the commitment in the AU Constitutive Act to the promotion and protection of human rights. It is clear that the APRM Forum is not being used to its full potential. This will not change until there is a genuine commitment to human rights in the member states. Constructive criticism must replace the current non-interference attitude reflected by African leaders both in the APRM Forum and in the UPR. Public pressure is even more important than peer pressure, but can only play its full role if basic human rights, both socio-economic and civil and political, are respected. It follows that the APRM is likely to have its biggest impact in states with an active civil society and a government open to debate.

Sanctions can play a role in promoting compliance. Sanctions must be targeted and limited, as comprehensive economic sanctions could in themselves constitute violations of human rights. However, it is unlikely that the APRM Forum would ever take steps to impose sanctions based on non-implementation of recommendations in the country review reports or commitments in the POA. More likely is the withdrawal of aid as a sanction by donors. Such sanctions should be used with caution both because of its potential effect on the enjoyment of human rights and because donor conditionality could pose a threat to domestic accountability. With regard to capacity building a country may be in need of technical expertise from abroad but the government should determine itself when, why and how such expertise should be used. The APRM provides a framework to identify such needs.

There is much monitoring taking place with regard to the different issues covered in the APRM, both at the national and international level. The case studies on Ghana, Rwanda and Kenya in chapters 6 to 8 therefore examine human rights concerns which have been raised by national and international actors and to what extent these concerns have been reflected in the country review reports, the POA and implementation reports. The case studies illustrate that almost all the human rights issues that make their way into the country review report and the POA have been raised before by various actors. The importance of the APRM lies in the POA which provides a new platform on which to move from talk to action. The implementation reports provide a further step towards accountability.

The case studies also illustrate that many relevant issues are not included in the POA or even in the recommendations of the country review report. The Questionnaire does not seem to have much influence on this situation as some issues that are not dealt with in the Questionnaire are adequately dealt with in the country review reports.

The case studies also illustrated the linkages between the APRM and other development plans, in particular poverty reduction strategy papers. Ideally the APRM process should merge with the national planning process to create an African alternative to the current poverty reduction strategies over which the IMF and the World Bank have significant influence. At least the outcomes of the APRM process should feed into the drafting of other development plans as illustrated by the Ghanaian experience.

9.2 Conclusion and recommendations

It is now clear that 2015 will come and go without the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs) being realised in most African states. Part of the explanation for this failure is a society which both domestically and internationally favours the rich. Rich nations are pitched against poor nations; rich elites in poor nations are pitched against the poor masses. Without a change in the rules of the playing field the situation of the poor is unlikely to improve.

The APRM constitutes one way of seeking to improve the situation for Africa’s poor and pursuing the realisation of the MDGs and human rights. But the APRM can only play this role if the requisite political will is there. Political will must in this context first and foremost come from the government of the countries which have agreed to be reviewed. They must create a participative, transparent process for conducting the self-assessment and developing the POA.

All residents of a country have an interest in the governance of the state in which they live and the APRM provides a framework for engagement with state representatives on governance issues. In this way democracy becomes more than only a question of regular elections. This is in particular important in a continent such as Africa where elections are often decided on other grounds than policy.

Engagement with civil society organisations (CSOs) provides the easiest means through which to ensure participation in analysing the problems facing a country and come up with solutions. However, this does not decrease the importance of allowing everyone who considers they can make a contribution to make their voice heard. Creating awareness is important, but the cost and benefit of various interventions must be carefully considered. Much data is being collected by various actors and when reliable data is readily available there is no need for the APRM to collect it on its own. The focus should be on the APRM as a complement to the myriad of existing procedures.

The government should be open to constructive criticism from the Panel and the country review team and where applicable clearly set out why a particular recommendation would not be reflected in the final POA. The government should facilitate the establishment of structures to ensure the effective implementation of the POA which should include its integration into the national budget. The POA should clearly indicate when action points need extra funding and the outcome of the APRM process should always be considered by those, for example donors, who want to engage the reviewed country on specific governance issues. The APRM Panel and Forum must be frank in its criticism when they see that a country does not fulfill these requirements.

This study has shown that the APRM can play a complementary role to global, regional and national institutional human rights monitoring. However, more needs to be done to secure its potential contribution to the realisation of human rights on the continent. Efforts should be undertaken to integrate findings and recommendations emanating from national and international human rights monitoring in the self-assessment and the country review report. Similarly, when evaluating state reports from countries that have been reviewed by the APRM, the monitoring bodies should take note of the relevant findings in the country review reports and the POAs.
Co-operation between the APRM structures and the African Commission on Human and Peoples’ Rights (African Commission) within the current framework is necessary, but not sufficient to make both institutions more efficient in the promotion and protection of human rights. African human rights instruments should form the basis of human rights related parts of the review and inform the development of the questions in a revised Questionnaire in a clearer way. The African Commission, the African Committee on the Rights and Welfare of the Child and other relevant organs should be closely involved in the development of these questions. Indicators should focus on what the government is willing and able to do. It is thus important to see both what has been achieved and what steps are being taken to improve the situation. In interpreting human rights the APRM Panel should follow the lead of the African Commission and other treaty monitoring bodies.

As the Questionnaire is already overly long it may alternatively be suggested that instead of listing numerous questions and indicators with regard to human rights, the Questionnaire could incorporate state reporting guidelines by reference. The state report, compiled in a participatory process, would thus form part of the self-assessment on which the POA would be based. This way the two processes could reinforce each other. The rapporteur on a state report to the African Commission would participate in the APRM country review mission and provide input into the drafting of the country review report. The state report and human rights aspects of the country review report and the POA would be considered by the full Commission in the procedure for examining state reports. Following this process, the Commission would then issue concluding observations setting out any recommendations or comments on issues that it thinks have not been adequately addressed. The concluding observations would be posted on the internet and sent to the government under review, NGOs, national structures responsible for monitoring implementation of the POA, the APRM Secretariat in South Africa and other relevant stakeholders thus feeding into the on-going review process and domestic debate. As the African Charter requires a state to submit a state report every second year, reports which are submitted between APRM cycles could be seen as implementation reports.

The APRM requires the state to launch a participatory process with the aim of establishing a national consensus on how to redress governance deficiencies. Human rights have a role to play with regard to the APRM process itself and in identifying and addressing governance shortcomings. The specific, costed and time-bound commitments in the POA are unique to the APRM. If these commitments are developed through a rights-based approach and their implementation adequately monitored the APRM could play an important role in inducing compliance with human rights.
